

THE EDMONTON BULLETIN
 SEMI-WEEKLY.
 Published every Monday and Thursday by The Bulletin Company, Ltd., of the office, Bulletin Bldg., 218 Jasper Ave. East.
 SUBSCRIPTION.
 One year to Canada or British Post Office address $1.00.
 Six months to Canada or British Post Office address $1.00.
 One year U.S. Post Office address $1.50.
 Six months U.S. Post Office address $1.00.
 All subscriptions are payable in advance.
 Advertising rate card on application.
 Classified advertising one cent per word; four insertions for price of three, and six insertions for price of four.
 Notice of Stray Cattle four insertions $1.00.
 C. F. HAYES,
 Business Manager

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1910.

ONE MYSTERY CLEARED UP.

The Calgary Herald is concerned that the Bulletin has not been discussing what the Herald calls a "cabinet crisis." The Bulletin inclines to an old-fashioned and perhaps now unpopular notion, that a newspaper should wait till it knows what it is talking about before offering an opinion. To papers of the "progressive" Herald type this preliminary does not seem to be thought necessary. Probably the idea of it being necessary is not even understandable in those quarters.

THE POINT AT ISSUE.

The resolution proposed by Mr. Boyle brings the Alberta and Great Waterways railway project formally before the Legislature, and therefore into the arena of public discussion. This is now the question before the House and this is the time to settle it. The resolution challenges the bargain as not sufficiently safeguarding the public interests in a word so not important to the Province as a dollar's worth of railway for each dollar's worth of bonds sold. That is the point of the whole matter and that is the point the members of the Legislature must inquire into and give judgment upon.

FROM A FRIENDLY SOURCE.

The Canadian Courier, said to be edited by a prominent Toronto Conservative, has this to say about Mr. Borden's right-about on the naval question: "The situation is absolutely senseless. Their attitude betokens either a lack of reason and judgment or else a weak-minded resort to a dangerous political expedient. . . . So far as Mr. Borden is personally concerned, we believe that he is too well informed and has too much 'horse sense' to justify the resolution on any other ground than political expediency. . . . However, deficiencies and unity cannot be expected from a party which is so easily divided on a question as the Conservatives are on the naval policy."

DOING A BIG BUSINESS.

Canada's foreign trade for January was 30 per cent. more than for January last year and for the first ten months of the fiscal year shows a growth of 30 per cent. Exports of domestic produce showed an increase of 31 millions, more than half being agricultural products. Unfortunately there is no way of keeping track of the growth of internal trade. That this is growing and growing as rapidly as the foreign business does not however require to be proved by statistics. Business men can see it by scanning their ledgers, and others can note it in the enlarged business houses and the increasing number of them. Canada is becoming one of the greatest trading countries of the world, population considered. This, of course, is only another way of saying that production, which is the basis of our trade, is increasing at a wonderful rate.

THE CIGARETTE CURE.

Cards are to be posted in the hallways of the schools, warning pupils that cigarette-smoking is forbidden by law. Perhaps this will be a deterrent and perhaps not, for sometimes a too freely displayed restriction becomes a temptation. Anyway it would be more inspiring if beside the card were hung a stout leather strap, 2 1/4 inches wide, by a foot and a half long. The thought of the law and the penalties may inspire respect or awaken dread in a boy or girl, or it may not; but a recollection of the cowhide is pretty apt to produce a happy blending of these wholesome sentiments. It has a way of getting to the real seat of the trouble and inducing a lively sense of the wisdom and general desirability of obeying the rules. As the smoking is said to be done outside the school premises and outside school hours, the home rather than the school would seem to be the proper place for displaying these regulators.

While it is often impossible to prevent an accident, it is never impossible to be prepared—it is not beyond any one's power. In fact, it is in a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy and you are prepared for sprains, bruises and like injuries. Sold by all druggists.

PULLING DOWN THE BARRIERS.

Several years ago Canada granted a preference to the Mother Land in tariff matters, allowing food from Britain to come in under lower duties than were charged on those from other lands. To make the preference effective, Britain denounced the "favored nation treaty" with Germany which secured German products the same treatment in British colonies as were given to British goods. German goods then came onto a level with those of other foreign lands in respect of the Canadian market, and were admitted at the same tariff rates. Germany resented this action and put the highest duties in the German tariff against Canadian goods. Canada replied four years later by placing an extra "sur-tax" of one-third the duties on German goods entering this country.

We have not been doing much business with Germany since that time in comparison to that with other countries. For however useless tariffs are to create trade they are potent to divert it. Canadian people could not afford to import German goods under the higher duties, and the German people could not afford to buy Canadian goods under their high tariff charges. In 1900 we traded with Germany only to the extent of 7 and a half millions, against 13 and one-half millions in 1902. During the same time our trade with Britain grew from 166 millions to 204 millions, our trade with the United States from 192 millions to 272 millions, and our total foreign trade from 414 millions to 499 millions.

Of late, however, there have been happy signs of a weakening in this "heretic" attitude of the two countries toward each other. A movement begun in Germany to lessen the barriers against the importation of Canadian food stuffs, while a complimentary movement has occurred in this country in favor of removing some of the handicaps in the way of trade with Germany. Economic and sentimental reasons, were behind both movements. The German people want food and Canada wants markets for her surplus food products.

A step in this direction has been taken now, and an important one. A provisional trade agreement has been made whereby Canada takes off the embargo on German goods and allows goods to enter that country under lower duties. This is an important step in itself and will do much to slow trade to resume and occupy its normal channels. It is more important still in significance, for it denotes a willingness on the part of the two countries to trade with each other, and when two peoples make up their minds to buy and sell from each other they are pretty apt to throw down the artificial barriers which prevent this.

The conclusion of the French treaty no doubt had much to do with inclining Germany favorably toward our trade. Germany is a great rival of France in industry and commerce and is quite as anxious as the Republic to find markets for her goods. As a matter of fact Germany asked to be given the privileges secured by France under the new treaty. This was declined, however, and Germany consented to the trade arrangement on condition that the surtax only be removed. So far therefore as the Republic has it, we have given less than we receive. This is hopeful of the awakening recognition of the great countries of the world in the value of Canadian trade. This country is coming to be known as one whose trade is worth having.

It pays to look for markets. Had Canada been content to go on with France in industry and commerce, it could not have developed as well as it has. In fact, it would not have been made. But the Canadian ministers have been known to be looking for opportunities to secure the admission of Canadian goods into other countries on the most favorable terms. It was with this end in view that they approached France for a trade treaty, which was secured, and the securing of which has no doubt done much to bring Germany into a more sensible frame of mind toward us.

There is a splendid opportunity for Canadian food stuffs in the German market. Germany is largely a manufacturing country. Annually, immense quantities of grains, fruits, meats and other articles of food are brought in from abroad. There is little chance of this importation being stopped, for the German soil is so nearly all tilled and well tilled. Germany cannot hope to grow on her own soil the food her people need, even now, and her population is increasing rapidly. The new arrangement means that Canada will not be discriminated against hereafter in the German market. It is to be hoped it will lead to a further arrangement, securing us a preference there.

ANOTHER FLOP?

Newspaper readers must have come to the conclusion some time ago that the Opposition had discovered all the opportunities for suffering with one another on the naval question. With Mr. Borden calling for a Canadian navy, Mr. Monk declaiming against any navy at all, and Hon. Robert Rogers bombarding both of them and demanding cash contributions to the British Admiralty, it seemed that the whole ground had been covered and all the possibilities of divergent policies utilized. It was to be supposed that things having got to what seemed the worst they could get to they must mend if they changed at all, and that any further evolutionary process must be in the direction of concession and consolidation rather than of difference and disintegration. The lines of cleavage seemed to have all been found, and followed up in lively fashion. It was to be expected that the scattered bands would soon take note of their respective isolated positions and undertake some kind of concerted movement looking to a junction, or at least to the occupation of positions tolerably close to each other and from which some kind of general engagement could be made against the common foe. There were to be yet another break in the ranks, that still a new party would break away and strike out a new line of conduct for itself was scarcely supposable. This, however, is what has happened. The members from British Columbia have discovered that their's is a maritime province, also that it is the Province facing the Pacific, also that the Admiralty think that the next war is to centre in the Pacific. Wherefore, argue the British Columbia members, the thing to do is to put a Canadian navy in the Gulf of Georgia; a whole fleet, too, not a part of one. If there is to be war in the Pacific, they argue, then the ships and all of them should be in the Pacific. To divide the squadron and leave part of it in the Atlantic to save Britain while a couple of the cruisers come around to keep Japan off the Pacific littoral they regard as absurd. Britain has saved herself for a good while now and should be able to do it a few years longer; and anyway the proper place for a fleet is where a fleet is considered to be needed, which they hold, is clearly and beyond doubt, the coast waters of the Pacific Province.

Clearly this complicates matters for Mr. Borden. He had just brought himself around to abandon the Canadian navy idea and declare for a cash donation to the Admiralty, when suddenly these gentlemen demand a whole fleet in the waters of British Columbia. Obviously these gentlemen want a Canadian navy; for without a Canadian navy they cannot have the fleet in the Gulf. The avowed purpose of the contribution to the Admiralty would be not to build ships for service in the Pacific, but to build ships for service in the North sea, not to build ships to defend British Columbia against the Japanese or the Chinese, but to defend Great Britain against Germany. A vote for the contribution is therefore a vote against the British Columbia fleet. Compromise on this matter seems impossible. One side or the other must give way and give way completely. It will not be the British Columbia members, for they have declared for a fleet in the British Columbia harbors and a fleet in the British Columbia harbors would be an immensely popular cry with the electorate in the coast constituencies. The presence of a fleet means the spending of money, for repairs, stores, wages; and what British Columbia wants just now more than anything else is some new, generous and permanent source of expenditure. On this account a squadron of even modest dimensions would be worth more than a Spanish galleon crammed with the gold of the Indies. Besides it adds to one's sense of security to see a battleship swinging at anchor in the harbor. And when people have a government like that of Mr. McBride and are harassed by the kind of papers that are printed in Vancouver it would be comforting to them to know that there was one ultimate force available that could bow the oppressors and tormentors into limbo. The fleet for British Columbia waters, is altogether too promising an election cry to be abandoned. It has taken time, it is said, is the daughter of a prominent Venezuelan diplomat.

The girl, who was arrested in an apartment in West Sixty-Fifth street near Central Park west, has asserted that she was intimidated at the point of a revolver soon after she came to New York City from Venezuela, to take a place in the chorus at one of the opera houses here.

She has lived in constant fear of being killed by the man she accuses, and she has borne marks of beatings which he gave to her. A warrant has been issued for his arrest.

Methodist Minister Departs.

Windsor, Ont., Feb. 21.—Rev. David Hicks, for three years the popular pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church at Grosse Pointe, a short distance from Windsor, is absent from church by the village is in a state of excitement to be reported here as now in Detroit.

THE EATING SUPERSTITION.

Montreal Star.—Mr. James, the deputy mayor of agriculture, speaking at the Ontario Association of Farmers and Exhibitions, told the people of Toronto some truths of more than local application. He said, "Toronto people don't know how to buy food, how to keep it, how to prepare it, or how to eat it. There is more food going to waste in this city than would feed a whole city in Denmark, Germany, France and other European countries. Foodstuffs are not the moonrakers of Canada and their superstitions with regard to food are not greater than those of other Canadians. We nearly all pay too much, waste too much, spoil too much, and eat too much. Men that are sleek-headed men, and such as sleep of nights, are the sources of great anxiety to their friends because they 'do not eat.' They know better than to eat too much. They are martyrs in a modest kind of way to their principles of respect to have the right kind of friends and hosts constantly worry them and badger them to eat, and are offended if they do not eat. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other man to have the same tastes, and the same tastes, or at least the same habits, as himself. 'None of your steak for me,' says the British workman contemptuously, 'get me something to bite at.' Our fat friend as a rule, eats moderately, and his friends are not given to sympathy. 'Oh, he's ailing; his appetite's flat; poor beggar!' Their ideal is to eat a pound of a Strasbourg goose—the more the better, and the more the better. They are not given to moderation at the table. They are not given to being simple and are stigmatized as 'finicky.' The average human expects every other