"It—it was five years ago," said Mr.
Brede, hurriedly. I—I didn't tell you—when I was on the other side, you know—it was rather dangerous—well, as I was saying—it looked, oh, it didn't look at all like this."

A cloud floated overhead, throwing its great shadow over the field where we iay.
(The shadow passed over the mountain's brow and reappeared far below, a rapidly decreasing blot, flying eastward over the golden green. My wife and I exchanged glances once more.

Somehow, the shadow lingered over us side by side along the narrow path, and my wife and I walked together.

"Should you think," she asked me, "that a man would climb the Matterhorn the first year he was married?"

"I don't know, my dar." I answered

"I don't know, my dear," I answered evasively; "this isn't the first year I have been married, not by a good many, and I wouldn't climb it—for a farm."

"You know what I mean?" she said.

hen we reached the boarding-house,

Mr. Jacobus took me aside.

"You know," he began his discourse,
"my wife, she used to live in N'York!"

I didn't know; but I said yes.

"She says the numbers on the streets run that?"

"Please don't be stupid," said my wife,
"I meant their children."

"When I went upstairs that evening I found my wife putting her hair to bed—I don't know how I could better describe an operation familiar to every married man. I watted until the last tress was coiled up, and then I spoke.

"I've talked with Brede," I said, "and I didn't have to extechize him. He seemed to feel that some sort of an explanation was looked for, and he was very outspoken. You were right about the children—that is, I must have misunderstood him. There are only two. But the Matterhorn episcode was simple enough. He didn't realize how tangerous it was until he had got so far storic that he couldn't back out; and he

Mr. Brede's voice arose, after an awful stillness of what seemed like five minutes and was probably 30 seconds:

"Mr. Jacobus, will you make out your bill at once and let me pay it? I shall leave by the 6 o'clock train. And will you also send the wagon for my trunks?"

"I hain't said I wanted to have ye leave—"began Mr. Jacobus; but Brede cut him short.

"Bring me your bill."

"Bring me your bill." said Mr. Brede.

My wife and I went out for our morning's walk. But it seemed to us, when we looked at "our view," as if we could only see those invisible villages of which be redeated and rises of which we can catch no glimpse from lofty hills or from the heights of human self-esteem. "Bring me your bill!" said Mr. Brede. In My wife and I went out for our morning's walk. But it seemed to us, when we looked at "our view," as if we could only see those invisible villages of which Brode had told us—that other side of the ridges and rises of which we can catch no glimpse from lofty hills or from the heights of human self-esteem. We meant to stay out until the Brodes had taken their departure; but we returned just in time to see Pete, the Jacobus darky, the blacker of boots, the brusher of coats, the general handy man of the house, loading the Brede trunks on I the Jacobus wagon.

And, as we stepped upon the veranda, down came Mrs. Brede, leaning on Mr. Brede's arm, as though she were ill; and it was clear that she had been crying. There were heavy rings about her pretty black eyes.

"Look at that dress, dear," she whispered; "she never thought anything like this was going to happen when she put that on."

My was a pretty, delicate, dainty dress, a graceful, narrow-striped affair. Her hat was trimmed with a narrow-striped silk of the same colors—maroon and white—and in her hand she held a parasol that matched her dress.

"She had a new dress on twice a day," said my wife, "but that's the prettiest yet.

"But we returned just in time to see Pete, the Jacobus, and while playing about the moth of a well covered by loose boards, fell in. The well is 30 feet deep and contained ten feet of water at the time. The mother saw the fidal fall and, franticelly seizing a clothes line, lowered it into the well. The child grasped the line, but of course could not hold on tightly enough to be drawn out. The mother tied her end above.

"Will pet hold on tight till mamma runs for papa?" tremblingly cried the mother to the little one.
