ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

Some of the Many Traditions About Ireland's Patron Saint.

acter, His Memory Is Revered,

Whether such a person as St. Patrick ever existed or not is of little consequence, albeit he has been regarded for centuries as the Irish Moses; yet, like Homer, he is claimed by many countries.

It would seem, indeed, according to his faithful biographers, that his footsteps can be traced from the cradle to the grave by the places named after him. A better shrine to his memory is in the warm hearts of the Irish people who have perpetuated his name and kept his day as a national holiday ever since he was "discovered," for the place and time of both his birth and burial are as obscure as his origin.

It is said that he was born in 372 and carried into Ireland by pirates and sold as a swineherd. There he spent seven years, during which he learned the language and habits of the people.

His religious life and miracles are set forth in volumes, although we have no record of his existence until 200 years after his death. That he is a tradition to Ireland, as St. George and the Dragon are to England, is most probable, but very high authorities quote the absence of snakes in Ireland as proof positive of his miracle work. There is a history of that country

His religious life and miracles are set forth in volumes, although we have no record of his existence until 200 years after his death. That he is a tradition to Ireland, as St. George and the Dragon are to England, is most probable, but very high authorities quote the absence of snakes in Ireland as proof positive of his miracle work. There is a history of that country which contains the shortest chapter in any history, namely, "There are no snakes in Ireland."

Why St. Patrick charmed 'the snakes away, or how he did it, is not known. But there are no snakes on the Benerald Isle.

It is also traditional that he charmed a monster snake in Lough Dilveen, a lake situated between Tipperary and Cork, and that it can be heard crying to the saint, "He's a long Monday, Patrick."

It is a fact that in the present century a Mr. James Cleland—himself an Irishman—purchased a hat full of snakes in London and turned them loose on his estate in Ireland. They were simple harmless things, put the whole population rose and hunted them out, and for years everybody saw snakes in that wichnity if but a wind rippled the grass.

There is another pretty tradition of the

There is another pretty tradition of the saint. Wishing to explain the miracle of the Trinity, he plucked a shamrock and bade the people see how there were three leaves on one stem. So it is the Irish national emblem to this day.

"The plants that bloom forever, With the rose combined And the thistle twined, Defy the strength of foes to sever." There is a bit of analogy in the history of the Arabian shamrock, the trefoil held sacred by the Arabs.

sacred by the Arabs.

There is no disrespect to the good man—if he ever existed as a man instead of a myth—in the rollicking verses the people's poet has perpetrated to commemorate his virtues, wherein we are told that—yirtues, wherein we are told that—

"St. Patrick was a gentleman, He came of decent people; He built achurch in Dublin town And on it put a steeple."

But there is an error in the location. St. Patrick built we churches. One was at Kirkpatrick at Fleming, in Dumiries. Poteen is a fiery beverage of a national fame which is said to have been named after St. Patrick, but the good man himself was a temperance reformer. He at one time commanded his people to taste no strong drink between the matin bell and vespers. One man with more zeal than knowledge worked all day in the hot sun and would not even drink water, and at eventide he dropped dead. He has come down to the centuries as "Stadhach" (Thirsty) Colman for his pains.

According to the old song:

"The frogs jumped in the water,
The snakes committed suicide
To save themselves from slaughter,"
So great was the fright and commotion among the lower animals when the holy

Another story of the staff is of a more serious nature. When St. Patrick baptized the King of Munster at Cashel he accidentally rested the iron prod of the staff upon the king's foot. The saint did not notice this act of his, and leaning heavily on the crozier, he pressed it deep into the royal foot. The king suffered terribly, but believing it to be a part of the baptismal rite and the will of St. Patrick, he gave no sign of his anguish, ner allowed the unconscious saint to know what he had done, but rather rejoiced in his martyrdom.

St. Patrick is said to have been below medium size, but a man of great activity St. Patrick is said to have been below medium size, but a man of great activity and able to endure hardships. His biographers say that he slept on the ground with a stone for a pillow till he was past middle age. If he lived humbly he died luxuriously, and his funeral lasted twelve days, and was the most brilliant, and at the same time most religious wake ever recorded in Ireland. He was buried at Down.

"In Down three saints one grave do fill, Patrick, Bridget, Columbkill." "In Down three saints one grave do fill. Patrick, Bridget, Columbkill."
A story worthy of the patron saint is this On the hill of Armagh stands to-day a cathedral which the saint built and blessed 1,400 years ago. It has been rebuilt several times, it is true, but its priest bears the dignity conferred upon St. Patrick, primate and metropolitan of all Ireland. The archishop of Dublin is primate of Ireland, but without the official all.

These stories are the simplest of the multifarious St. Patrick mythology, but there are enough to fill volumes, all interesting, while many are profound.

Mr. John L. Blaikie, Vice-President, and President of one of the leading Loan Companies of Toronto, spoke of the financial position of the Company. He explained the care that was exercised in the investment of the Company's funds, and that they ever kept in view the important fact that security was of more importance that a high rate of interest. The company had kept their funds so actively employed that, with one exception, they show the largest interest-earning power of any Company in the Dominion.

Another point mentioned was that while

Another point mentioned was, that while large increases had been made in assets, etc., there was a marked decrease in death losses, indicating that the medical department was carefully looked after, and in skilled hands.

The auditor of the Company confirmed his written report by stating he knew that everything in the statement was correct, because he had gone over every item himself and also examined in detail the securities of the Company.

Touching the point of the large amount of mortgages, $699,000, and the fact that the overdue interest was less than one-fourth of 1 per cent., where so large a sum was involved, he considered it not only a highly satisfactory result, but somewhat phenomenal.
