a long thrilling account of intervening incidents which finally led to the following climax of the above account which conclusion is stated, verbatim as follows: "The crisis in my life came on the evening of May 24th, 1903, when yielding to an inward prompting which, gentle as it was yet overpowered all my natural reluctance and repugnance to such an act. I publicly took the sinner's place and confessed my need of the grace of God. Of course, the act of publicly kneeling and calling on the Name of the Lord is not the necessary part of the process of conversion. There is no specified place or manner in which the gift of eternal life is received. What is necessary, however, is that one should believe God, first, as to being a helpless sinner, and second, that Jesus Christ, risen from the dead, the eternal Son of God, is the sin-bearer for all who believe in Him, who was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification. I did not know the nature of what was happening for I did not believe in sudden conversions. I supposed that a change of nature, if it occurred at all, would be very gradual. Regard-
