Seeing a letter in the Yarmouth Mercury about sending young people out here for the sum of three pounds, I would like to say they had far better keep where they are for there are thousands of starving people out here. You would have felt sorry to have seen them lined up for a meal. There were twenty thousand in Toronto alone, and to be in the cold without food is pretty bad. This has been a long winter and if emigrants have no money when they land or have no one to push them into something they had better starve in their native land, for nine out of ten people who came from the old land cannot work on these farms. After twenty-four hours you get the rest of the day to yourself. My husband and I put in twelve months on a farm and I am now suffering for it. All the joints of my hands and feet are turning out. I enclose a few clippings and of my hands and feet are turning out. I enclose a few clippings and could send a lot more. Yarmouth is my home town and my brother is my home town and my brother sends me the Mercury every week, so I hope you will publish this letter. My advice is to keep the young blood at home and boost the fishing trade, not send them out to a country to freeze or starve to death.

In November last, while riding in a street car to West Toronto, a representative of The Times-Star fell into conversation with an Englishman, still young in years. The man had come to Canada as a boy, worked several years on a farm near Toronto, and then account a still the second as a farm of the second as a farm near toronto, and then account as a starting in the second as a second as a starting in the second as a second and then secured a situation in the

What His Dad Had Done

(Toronto Star.)

A stranger, visiting the United States, fell into the hands of an American who was active in showing his new acquaintance the scenic and architectural wonders of the country. Unfortunately the American gave way too often to boastfulness regarding these wonders and disparaged too confidently the attractions of Europe. Finally the other felt that he must put a sked suddenly, "Have you heard of the Dead Sea?"

The time is rapidly approaching when domestic fuel cannot be obtained from across the border whether Canadians wish to import it or not. The country's interests demand that under these circumstances independence of that source of supply should be assured by the encouragement of the industry within our borders.

CRITICS everywhere agree that this CRITICS everywhere agree that this contemporary sonnet is as fine, and will endure as long, as anything in any age. Mrs. Meynell, who lives in London, will hold a place in English letters comparable with that of Christina Rosetti and Mrs. Browning. It was she and her husband who found and rescued Francis Thompson, and it was to them that one of the most gorgeous dedications in all literature was offered by that sad, shy singer, in return for all they had done for him.
