Twenty minutes later, his daughter and niece, Blanche Leroy, joined him at breakfast in the sitting room, for the doctor had taken a suite on that floor during his stay in Brighton, and the latter was all eagerness to hear all about the stranger. Mimie told her, and said that Blanche would soon see her, as she was going to dress directly.

"And, father," added the girl, "she asked for a leather travelling belt she had worn."

"I've got it safe, my dear; you shall give it to her; it has money and valuables in it doubtless."

"Yes, she said so; she was afraid it might have been lost. Ta! ta! I'm going to help her dress; she isn't very strong yet. Oh, Blanche, she is such a beautiful woman!"
"She is the most superbly handsome woman I have ever seen," said the doctor; "and a face quite out of the ordinary run."

"You pique my curiosity amazingly, breakfast things as Mimie left the room.

"I'm going out now for a blow and

"Oh, you are all too kind," faltered Christine; "but I shall be able to go to London this atternor."

"Go to—fiddlesticks!" said the doctor, gruffly. "Your pulse is very low and weak still, and no wonder. You don't

"But, Doctor Clifford, please listen. I must go; you have all done to much already for a perfect atranger of whom you know nothing—Nay, hear me!"
"Oh, I'll hear you, if you're a veritable sea lawyer, but as to knowing nothing—h'm!—you are proud, and have a will of your own"—lightly touching the resolute but tender mouth—"and so have I. Physicians are autocrats, and you don't go till I choose—that's flat!"
"Doctor Clifford," said Christine, desperately. "I feel under false pretences till you hear me. I was not a passenger aboard the Undine, but only her stewardess, shipped for the home trip."
"Very good, my dear Mrs. Errington; and an honest, respectable berth, too," said the physician, composedly. "The ups and downs of life have no law but mecessity; you are none the less a well-born, well-bred lady because Dame Fortune chose somehow to make a football of you and kick you out of your proper place into the berth of a stewardess; and I'll be bound you did your duty as such, too. She flushed up.

In vain the stranger tried to protest against being further trouble to any one. The doctor laid his finger on her lips, bidding her, smiling, "be a good girl"; and his daughter, with sweet, girlish impulsiveness, stooped and kissed the broad, clear brow.

"You are no trouble at all; and, oh, I'm so glad you are stronger this morning and will soon be up."

"As soon as the clothes are ready she may," said her father, moving to the door. "By the bye, may I know your name?—mine you have just heard; and it is awkward, isn't it, not to know a lady's name in speaking to her?"

"Yes—forgive me—I should have told you, Doctor Clifford—mine is Christine Errington—Mrs. Errington."

I at once went down to the Undine and offered myself for the berth, telling Captain Sebright the exact truth, which my boarding-house people could verify. How he laughed! but he had got a lot of lady-passengers and his own wife aboard, and was in a corner; so he shipped me, and I joined that night."

"Quite an adventure," said the doctor. "Dear me- and then to be shippwrecked, and lose everything—clothes-and all!"

"Not much, luckily," said the fair couriere and ex-stewardess, smiling. "I never travel with a large wardrobe, and I had sent over here before I left Paris all save what was absolutely necessary for the run to New York and back. And I always were that belt with whitever I always wore that belt with whatever money or valuables I had in it. Besides I shall be paid, of course, directly I get

"Not a bit of it, Miss Clifford. But we had had a very rough passage, especially up Channel; and that gale of the last forty hours was about one of the heaviest I have ever been in. If we could have kept her engines going, all might have been well, strained though she was; but early last evening she took green seas on board, and one, that nearly pooped her, rushed down into the engine-roow and swamped out the fires, besides carrying away the binnacle and damaging the steering-gear. Then, of course, she wouldn't keep steerage way, and became unmanageable, driving help-lessly before the gale—on, on to this lee shore. Then our skipper fired two signals of distress, and got the boats ready—with little hope, though, he todl me, of their living in such a sea." "Not a bit of it, Miss Clifford.

I suppose I had too much to do to think of fear and death sentiently. You see, I was a sort of she-captain," she added, with a slight smile, "and had my poor, frightened women-passengers and young children to encourage and control. Poor things! it was hard enough to keep some of them from shrieks and confusion, which bewilder the men, and too often loses all chance of rescue. But Captain Sebright was so cool, so splendid, that it inspired everybody to be brave!" she said, enthusiastically. "It was such an example!" was such an example!

"So, I suspect, was somebody's else—quite as much," said the doctor, significantly. "Then you are out of work again, Mrs. Errington?"
"Yes."

"Yes."
Clifford got up, and began walking up and down slowly, with his hands behind him, and a puckered brow, cogitating over something.
His daughter turned; but at that moment a waiter entered, and said that a gentleman wished to see Dr. Clifford; he was in the next room (used for dinner by the Cliffords).

"Excuse me, then, ladies," said the physician; and went away into the other sitting-room, where he found a middle-aged man—numistakably seafaring—awaiting him.

"Ah, you are, then, Captain Sebright!" exclaimed Dr. Clifford, "I am bright!" exclaimed Dr. CHIFORd. "I am delighted to know you, for I have just been hearing about you from your stewardess. She says you inspired them all."

"Nonsense! I only did my duty," said the other, quickly. "But she—she's a splendid woman! She doesn't know what fear or losing her head means.
