The Second Chance.

By RUTH CAMERON.

RUTH CAMERON.

"The bored looking woman of thirty-five or thereabouts cast a half-amused half-supercilious glance at the crowd on the deck of the excursion boat of which she was a physically jostled, mentally aloof unit.

"And to think there was a time when I was twenty-one or twenty-two, when Harry and I thought a little trip like this with a lunch on the beach and the sail back by moonlight was rather a lark. And a time before that--" her thoughts raced back still farther to the time when she had been an intense little youngster to whom pleasures like an excursion were rare enough to seem wonderful adventures--when it was something I would have looked forward to for weeks."

She saw the thin-legged little girl that was.

The woman of thirty-five or thereabouts looked out across the water without seeing the dancing white sails. There was a little mist of remissent tenderness in front of her eyes and she was seeing instead a thin-legged, brown-eyed, intense little youngster hanging over the railing of the boat until the by-standers held their breath; then she saw her astride the biggest horse of the flying horses making frantic lunges to catch the magic ring. And next she was sitting at a little table eating huge spoonfuls of pink ice-cream and swinging her thin legs under the table in the pure ecstasy of life and motion.

The mist of remissent tenderness became so thick that the lady performed brushed it away with her handkerchief.

"And now," she was thinking, "I endure this trip only because it is the easiest way to get where I'm going. I'm bored, and so," she looked across at the man beside her who was reading his paper, "so is Harry. What wouldn't I give for some of the old intensity and the old happiness in little things? It doesn't seem fair that that should last so short a time and we should have to go on living so long afterwards. Seems as if we ought to have another chance at it."

They Didn't Want Any Children.

Suddenly the lady of thirty-five or thereabouts turned her head sharply to the right. Someone had said "Peter, be careful." Now Peter was the lady's favorite name. She and Harry had never wanted children. They had decided long years ago that children tied you down too much and made you old too soon. But if they had ever had a son his name would have been Peter. So the bored lady looked to the right and this is what she saw--a man and a woman about her own age and a fair-haired boy of seven or eight with an intense little face shining with happiness and two thin legs sticking sharply out behind as he knelt on the seat and leaned so far over the rail that the two big folks had to say "Peter, be careful."

This Time Life Talked To Her.

But they didn't say it crossly, these two. Instead, they smiled at each other across those intense little legs and as the bored lady saw that smile and a queer feeling came into her heart. They didn't look bored, those two grown-ups, they looked very happy.

not just as the child did, but in a sweet tender way. They were having another chance at happiness, not the ecstatic kind to be sure, but perhaps it made up in depth and tenderness for what it lacked in intensity.

The bored looking lady who had never wanted children turned suddenly away from Peter and the two who were happy with and through him. She had heard people talk before in fine generalities of what one missed by not having children. Today she had heard life itself talk in concrete realities.

EVERYDAY ETIQUETTE

"What kind of a suit should a bridegroom wear at a church wedding where the ushers wear evening suits?" asked Miss Bride-to-be. "If the wedding is after six in the evening all of the men should wear evening dress. If it takes place before that time, the proper dress consists of a frock coat, gray trousers, pearl or gray waistcoat, and pearl or light colored gloves," instructed her father.

The series of health lectures and lessons given at the Grenfell Hall by Mrs. McIntyre and Miss Hall, continue to grow in popularity. The morning attendance has more than doubled, and no doubt a large number will avail themselves of the opportunity to hear the remaining lessons. The subjects of the lectures to-day are "The Marvels of Digestion" by Mrs. McIntyre, and "Investments and Dividends" by Miss Hall. Mrs. McIntyre will also give some valuable exercises for the stomach and intestines, and tell how the vital organs may be strengthened. Miss Hall's lessons will be illustrated by a large number of foods, each article of food representing the same amount of food value, and will be interesting to the men as well as to the housewives. The lectures will begin at 8 o'clock this evening. Anyone having questions to ask on these subjects will have them answered if placed in writing and passed in at this evening's meeting.
