""This we shall see,' answered the Colonel, and old Sir James was marcher off to a cell, and othere closely confined on bread and water. But he did not die next day, nor the next week.

Every day he was brought up before the Colonel and questioned as to where the treasure was, under the threat of immediate death, not being suffered meanwhile to communicate by word or sign with any one, save with the officers of the rebels, and every day he refused, until at last the inquisitor's patience gave out, and he was told frankly that if he did not communicate the secret he would be shot at dawn the following day.

"Old Sir James laughed, and said that shoot him they might, but he consigned his soul to the devil if he would enrich them with his treasures, and then asked that his Bible might be brought to him that he might read therein and prepare himself for death.

"I will not reveal," answered the old man. 'Murder me if you will. The act is worthy of the holy Presbyters. I have spoken and my mind is fixed."

"Bethink you, 'said the Colonel.

"I have thought, and I am ready. Slay me and seek the treasure. But one thing I ask. My young son is not here. In France he hath been these three years, and naught knows he of where I have hid this gold. Send to him this Bible when I am dead. Nay, search it from page to page. There is naught within save what I have writ here in the last sheet. It is all I have left to give.' Be what it may the time of day, the place be where it will. "The book shall be searched,' answered the Colonel, 'and if naught is found therein, is shall be sent. And now, in the name of God, I adjure you, Sir James, let not the love of lucre stand between you and your life. Here I make you one last offer. Discover but to us the whereabouts of the 10, 000 pieces whereof you speak in this writing—nd he held up the letter to the King—and you shall go free—refuse to do so and you die.'

It remained under the tree, pawing the ground and giving vent to its rage in loud bellowings. Murray called loudly for help, but he was out of the hearing of anyone about there. It grew so dark that he could see nothing, and only knew that the bull was keeping up the siege by the noise it made. For three hours the bull kept the old man up the tree. Murray was nearly dead from cold and exhaustion. At last the animal grew weary of its unavailing siege of the farmer, and, when Murray had made up his mind that his time had come, he was overjoyed to hear the ugly beast walking away. Murray waited a few minutes, until he could hear the bull no more, and then let himself down from the tree.

could hear the bull no more, and then lev himself down from the tree.

When it became dark and the old farmer had not yet returned home his son James went in search of him. He went to the neighbor's farm, and to many other places without finding any trace of his father. He was returning home to get others to aid in the search, when he stumbled over something in the road. Stooping down he discovered that it was his father, lying there unconscious. It was then 11 o'clock. The son got the old man home, but it was a long time before he was able to explain anything. He remembered getting down out of the tree, but how he got to the road he had no recollection. The shock to his enfeebled system has been such that no hope is entertained that he will recover. himself down from the tree.
