wise as to hold thy tongue.

Griselda, darting homewards through the twilit garden, is conscious, in spite of her depression, of something that suggests a belief in Peyton's power to see her again, and with this there returns to her the remembrance of what he said of Seaton Dysart-of his engagement to a Miss Butler. Oh, but this will be good news for poor, dear

Her light walk quickens into a run, and as she reaches the summer-house, a favorite resort of Vera's, notwithstanding the rather unpleasant associations connected with it, she stops, and pokes her head in, to find Vera there. "I've come back," she cries breath lessly, sinking into a seat and looking at Vera with despair in her eyes. "I have done as you advised me, have said good-bye to him for ever. "Oh, well—come, now, that's not so bad," says Vera, cheerfully, forgetful of prudence at sight of her sister's grief. "He seems, from all I have heard from you, a-a-sort of a person who would be difficult to baffle. I think 1 should put faith in that declaration of his if I were you."

"Oh, he said more than that," cries Griselda, grateful beyond measure for the overflowing sympathy with which her story has been received; "he said something that will make you glad, too, something that, if we can prove it, will put an end to all that dreadful old man's machinations. And, oh, Vera, darling, if I haven't seemed to feel enough for you, it wasn't that I didn't. I declare, when he told me today, I thought I could never get at you soon enough to tell you." She quite "But what is it?" asks Vera nervous-

"Why, it appears that Tom-Mr.Peyton, knows Seaton quite well, and likes him, too. Think of that! I assure you I had quite a quarrel with him about Seaton-Dysart, as he calls him-and he, Tom, declares there are few fellows so charming or so much to be liked as our unpleasant cousin.'

'Well, but that can't be it; there must be something else. It would not add to my happiness to hear Mr. Dysart's praises sung. It strikes me that your friend cannot be a person of very deep penetration."

"I don't think you should despise him he is very reasonable, as a rule," says Griselda, a little coldly, "and after all, are you not hard on Seaton? Many a man marries for prudence sake; it is not altogether an unheard-of thing, and, from what I could gather from you. Seaton behaved very well that night you were shut out in the gar-

AGAINST JOCKEYS

English Owners Come to Conclusion That They Have Been Paying Excessive Fees.

London, Feb. 12.-There is likely to be a distinct slump in jockeys' fees this season. Of late years the very rich men teresting game of hockey will be played of the turf have been ruining the jocin Jubilee Rink this (Friday) night, eys by absurd rates of pay, and the the contestants being the Romblers and overpaid jockeys have been ruining the sport. Tod Sloan's wonderful success which was won by the Ramblers by a on the English turf caused a regular score of 3 to 2, but it took ten minutes invasion of American riders, and the big men "from the city," who know little of racing and less of real sport, paid ridiculous sums to secure the services of these youngsters in order to compete with millionaire sportsmen. One of these, for instance, paid the and the third between the St. John's light-weight, Arthur Redfern, $18,000 for his services, and the Messrs. Keene, father and son, retained Lucien Lyne at $20,000 per annum. In addition to these ridiculous sums jockeys now expect enormous presents when they win a big race The result is that the older jockeys who are getting a little too weighty to get the best "mounts," are subject to the great temptation of making big bets on a crack light-weight without tempting to ride honestly for their masters This state of affairs is now openly recognized by the jockey club, and the King, who has old-fashioned and healthy views of the sport, has already in timated to the members it is time they bestirred themselves against the evil. The jockey club cannot issue any edict, but the most influential members are bound to hold a conference with thi trainers and some of the new owners who have too much money and too little sporting instinct. The themselves would be very glad to welcome again the owners of moderate means, with a string of two or three horses, for they are grumbling very much at the bad times, and the majority of them will exercise all their influence during the next few months to abolish the system of paying large retaining fees to jockeys, for it is this as much as anything else, they say, which is keeping many would-be ers away from the turf.

JOAN OF ARC

She Was an Italian. Rome Feb. 11. - The curious theory of Arc was an Italian, or, at least, The noble Ghisilieri family of Bo-royal and that he would rather re-nounce his rights to the throne and the peninsula, unfil Ferrante Ghisilieri, Ludovisi, was obliged to escape from Bologna, and emigrated to Lorraine France, in 1401, where he maintained himself by the work of his hands. He had three children, one of whom, according to the Ghisilieri chronicle, was "Gianna, insigne guarriera in Francia" (Gianna, illustrious warrior in France). The parents of "La Pucelle," of Arc's mother was a foreigner.
