"This is a fine country, I must say. At least the king should acquaint his visitors with the true cause of this treatment." In his turn the Englishman resorted to oblique glances.

"The King?" The inspector raised a shoulder and spread his hands. "The king is a paralytic, Monsieur, and has little to say these days."

"A paralytic? I thought he was called the handsome monarch."

"That was years ago, Monsieur. For three years he has been helpless and bedridden. The archbishop is the real king nowadays. But he meddles not with the police."

"This is very sad, I suppose it would be impossible for strangers to see him now."

"An audience?" a sparkle behind the spectacles. "Is your business with the king, Monsieur?"

"My business is mine," shortly. "I am only a tourist, and should have liked to see the king from more curiosity. However, had you explained all this to me, I should not have caused you so many gray hairs."

"Monsieur did not give me the chance," simply.

"True," the Englishman replied soberly. He began to think that he had been over-hasty in asserting his privileges. "But this hunting nothing to do with me. My name is John Hamilton. See, it is engraved on the stock of the gun," catching it up and holding it under the "spectacled eyes," which still observed it with some trepidation. "That is the name in my passport, in the book downstairs, in the lining of my hat. I am sorry, since you were only obeying orders, that my rough play has caused you alarm. He unbolted the door. "Good morning," simply.

The inspector left the room as swiftly as his short legs could carry him, ignoring the ethical of common politeness. As he stumbled down the stairs he cursed the minister of police for requiring this spy work of him, and not informing him why it was done. Ah, these cursed Anglians from Anglet! They were all alike, and this one was the worst he had ever known. And there, at the end of the hall, in the center of the room and scratched his head. "Hang it, I've made an ass of myself. That blockhead will have the gendarmes call this afternoon. I'll arrest me there will be the devil to pay. The Lord and the Baronet Fitzgerald!" he repeated. He sat down on the edge of the bed, and fell to laughing again. "Confound these picture-book kingdoms! They always take themselves so seriously. Well, the gendarmes call this afternoon. I'll not be at home. No, thank you. I shall be hunting pheasants."

And there he set to work cleaning the gun which had all but prostrated the inspector. Soon the room smelled of oiled rags and tobacco. Sometimes the worker whistled softly. Sometimes he let the gun fall against his knee, and stared dreamily through the window at the flight of the ragged clouds. Again, he would shake his head, as if there were something which he failed to understand. Half an hour passed, when again some one knocked on the door.

"Come in!" Under his breath he added, "The gendarmes, likely."

But it was only the proprietor of the hotel. "Asking Herr's pardon," he said, "for this intrusion, but I have secured a man for you. I have the honor to recommend Johann Kopf as a good guide and hunter."

"Send him up. If he pleases me, I'll use him."

The proprietor withdrew.

Johann Kopf proved to be a young German with a round, ruddy face, and a pair of blue eyes looking out of it. The Englishman saw in him an inquisitive, even suspicious.

"Are you a good hunter?" he asked.

"There is none better hereabout," answered Johann, twirling his cap with noticeably white fingers. It was only in after days that the Englishman appreciated the full significance of this answer.

"Speak English?"

"No, Herr's German is excellent, however."

"Humph!" The Englishman gave a final glance into the shining tubes of the gun, snapped the breach, and slipped it into the case. "You'll do. Return to the office; I'll be down presently."

"Will Herr hunt this morning?"

"No, what I wish this morning is to see the city of Bleiberg."

"That is simple," said Johann. The feeble, imperceptible smile did not leave his eyes of false keenness.

He bowed out. When the door closed the Englishman waited until the sound of retreating steps faded away. He took the gun case which he had not yet opened, and thrust it under the mattress of the bed.

"Johann," he said, as he put on a soft hat and drew a cane from the strap of the traveling bag, "you will certainly precede me in our hunting expeditions. I do not like your eyes; they are not at home in our boyish face. Humph! what a country. Every one speaks a different tongue."

The city of Bleiberg lay on a hill and in the valleys which fell away to the east and west. It was divided into two towns, the upper and the lower. The upper town and that part which lay on the shores of the Werter See was the modern and fashionable district. The lower town, with its narrow streets and the archbishop's palaces and the wealthy tier brick and stone. There were wide gravel paths and long avenues of larch, chestnut and alders, iron benches, fountains and winding flower beds. The park, the palaces and the Continental Hotel, with its terraces and parapet at the water's edge, and a delightful open-air cafe facing the Platz. September and October were prosperous months in Bleiberg. Fashionable people who desired quiet made Bleiberg an objective point. The pheasants were plump, there were boars, gray wolves, and not infrequently Monsieur Fourcass, the shaggy coat wandered across from the Carpathians.

As to the lower town, it was given over to the shops and markets, the barracks, the university, and the Rathaus, which served as the house of the Diet. It was full of narrow streets and quaint dwellings.

Up the Konigsstrasse the guide led the Englishman, who nodded whenever the visible chatter of the German pleased him. When they began the descent of the hill, the vista which opened before them drew from the Englishman an exclamation of delight. There lay the lake, like a bright new coin in a green purse; the light of the sun broke on the white buildings of the palace, from the windows, and the lawns twinkled like emeralds.

"It makes Vienna look to her laurels, eh, Herr?" said Johann.

"But it must have cost a pretty penny."

"Aye, that it did; and the king is being impressed with the fact every day. There are few such fine palaces outside of first-class kingdoms. The cathedral there was erected at the expense of a king who died very old. It is full of romance. There is to be a grand wedding there on the 20th of this month. That is why there are so many fashionable people at the hotels. The Crown Prince of Carmania, which is the large kingdom just east of us, is to wed the Princess Alexia, the daughter of the king."

"On the 20th? That is strange."

"Strange?"

"To me, nothing," said the Englishman, jerking back his shoulders. "I had in mind another affair."

VICS WILL NOT PLAY FOR CUP;
WANTED A SUDDEN DEATH GAME

Stanley Cup Series Called Off—Wingham Wins Northern League Championship.

Ottawa, March 14.—There will be no more Stanley cup games this season. The Victoria, of Montreal, refused to play here on the date based upon the fact that some wanted a "sudden death" game or a series of home games. The trustees notified them that their terms were impossible, and further games will not be considered this season.

Tavistock, Ont., March 14.—In a fast game of hockey here tonight Tavistock defeated Baden by a score of 9 to 3.

Montreal, March 14.—In an exhibition hockey game at the Arena here tonight, the Rat Portage Thistles, even at the expense of a local team, the Wanderers, delighted a large crowd of spectators.

BEST SEASON YET EXPERIENCED,
SAYS VICE-PRESIDENT NELSON

Berlin, March 14.—At the social gathering which marked the close of the Ontario Hockey Association's season, when the intermediate championship was decided, Vice-President Francis Nelson, replying to the toast of the association, said that the season was the heaviest and the most satisfactory in its career. The association had grown to be the most powerful, the most respected, and the most useful of any governing body in Canadian athletic sports. That enviable result had not been attained by accident, but was the outcome of a settled and continuous policy of strictness and impartiality in the control of its affairs and the disposal of its business. And it had not been attained by force, but by the most honest and most open opposition both from within and without. In the O. H. A., as elsewhere, there were to be found clubs and individuals who were not satisfied with an "even break." Unless they had the best of it, they considered themselves unfairly dealt with.

Perhaps the most serious obstacle the association had to contend with was the bitter and unreasoning partisanship which had endeavored all the offenses of the home team, and had nothing but condemnation for the visitors. This absence of the spirit of fair play was reflected in the newspapers, frequently in an exaggerated form, as for instance, a long editorial in the Toronto News, attributing murder or manslaughter to the O. H. A., because the executive did not show interest in what the association. There was nothing in the evidence calling for any such action, but they were "the other fellows," and had no right to say so. On the question of rough play, he pointed out that the association had always taken the strongest stand, and referees were supported to authority.

When a player was debarred by the O. H. A. for rough work he never got back again. The result of this policy was that the season just closed was one which would repay a moment's consideration. In the three championship series some 300 games were played, engaging 4,200 players, and in all the season the association had complaint of rough and foul play in only 10 games.

Hockey being a game of personal contact, played on an unyielding ice, on skates, and by a rough work, the result in accidental injury. Its natural dangers were greater than those of other sports. Yet what was the record, so far as the O. H. A. was concerned? In all the 300 games only two complaints, and not a single case of serious injury, accidental or intentional, in the fastest sport that is played, with over 4,000 participants, with that record to present to the association, he thought they might afford to give no further consideration to the most successful central body in Canadian hockey. Mr. Nelson said that he could speak the more freely of the association and its merits as he would not again be an office holder. The work thrown upon members of the executive who lived in Toronto was growing more arduous every year, with the increasing size of the association, and he had given it all the time he possibly could, though he would never lose interest in what he considered an organization of great benefit to the community.
