I. North America declares herself free, and becomes, so; revolution in the state of things; the spirit of emancipation pervades Europe, as well as South America; attempts made by Miranda; formal insurrection of the Spanish American provinces.	I
II. Condition of the European states, on their entering upon the new period of the world. Internal remissness; thirst after external aggrandizement; the political unity of Germany nearly dissolved; in like manner the representative estates; standing armies after the Prussian model; financial elaboration of the several countries; want of national spirit. Political union in France, Spain and Portugal, by means of absolute dominion; views of the governments inimical to the interests
