The outside world seemed very far the women smiled at me as though they away.

We took long drives together in the knew our secret. And the blacksmith at the corner flung a horseshoe after us, waving a kindly hand.

"That means good luck, Jim," I cried well pleased.

We took long drives together in the big, new car. We strolled together in the woods, and had dear, ridiculous little picnics.

Each day Jim seemed to gain new health and strength. "The most wonderful nurse in the world," he called

She insisted on taking down my redgold mane, and brushing it until it shone like burnished copper.

"Madame has beautiful hair," she murmured, with a slightly foreign accent. She arranged my locks in a new style, with a side-parting, and a big wave that went across my forehead,

The meal was over one ear. "Ah, madame is seaturily to distraction!"

Although I don't believe in flattery, I was pleased. I wanted to look lovely—on this my wedding night.

I wore a paie green frock, simple in style, and very youthful, with some sweet-scented illy-of-the-valley pinned into the corsage.

"Monsieur will of a surety adore madame," gurgled Annette, delighted, stepping a few paces backward, and surveying her handiwork with a satisfied eye. "Madame is ravissante."

It was a warm, spring-time evening, and we dined with the windows opened to a perfumed, dusky world, my Jim and I. We didn't talk much, but we were supremely happy.
