Of this the Intercolonial is a direct result of the union, in the sense that its construction was an essential condition of the contract. The St. John and Maine Railroad, or the Western Extension, as it was then called, was already in progress at the time of the union, and would have been completed if the province had remained out of confederation. The New Brunswick Railway owed nothing to confederation. There is this ground tor hopefulness in a long of entail, and the extension of tenants, rights—these and other changes are near at hand, and it is not surprising that those who are interested in maintaining the present condition of things, and in this class would come all of the Times' prominent men, should abstain Irom seconding Gladstone.
