

CANDIDATE MACKENZIE KING (continued)

anti-conscription
 Africa, India or Ireland should not, in my judgment, be attempted in Canada. To seek to enforce conscription here may lead to trouble not only in Canada, but throughout the British Dominions, and that would do greater injury to the Empire than anything else that could happen at this time. Apart from this, it seems to me that it is more important to have a national survey taken, and to mobilize and render effective all our national resources through the united effort of all parties. This I would strongly advise.

14 CANDIDATE ROSS (East Middlesex)

prob. per mt.
 Briefly, I believe in Sir Wilfrid, and in his policy. But in view of the opposing positions taken by our leaders, we are without doubt in a state of confusion worse confounded. Unity at the top, and down through the ranks, is absolutely necessary, and unless it is brought about, and that speedily, we cannot hope to win.

15, CANDIDATE HONEYWELL (Carlton)

Like my friend, Captain Dudley of Norfolk, I also have been at the front, and I have experienced some of the treatment of which he complained. I am not going to speak of that, as the papers are on file, and some day the record will be produced. I think it highly important that our friends who are being misled about the number of divisions at the front, and the necessity for keeping the ranks filled, should understand exactly what goes on at the front, and how many men Canada is able to supply out of her population to keep the ranks at the front replenished.

Mr. Honeywell then gave a most interesting and minute description of the manner in which the front line and other trenches are manned, and of the way in which the men are relieved and re-inforced. In his opinion, the number of divisions which it was sought to keep at the front is greater than the present population of Canada would justify. Just as it was no disgrace to France when Britain took over part of her front line, and just as it was no
