

*Cattle raising industry and mixed farming
industry*

of the available land of the West, it is easy to see where the cattle raising industry—to which much less attention has been paid—will arrive when the movement towards mixed farming that has set in so strongly shall have been developed to the full capacity of this marvellously rich and growing section of Canada.

Great as has been the progress made by the Canadian West during the past twenty-five years, the progress of the future bids fair to be far greater, and not only will Winnipeg develop into a mighty city of the size and importance of Chicago and New York, but other cities in Western Canada must grow out of the trade and commerce which will follow the putting under cultivation of the almost illimitable stretches of prairie land that still lies untouched by the plow, untraversed by the reaper and binder. It is the story of an opportunity—the last of its kind on the American continent if not in the world—an opportunity so exceptional, so remarkable, so fraught with the promise of honestly gained wealth to the humblest worker with a spark of ambition in his breast—that it would be almost a crime for visitors not to spread the knowledge of it broadcast on their return home.
