Lady Marjorie's Love

"We know me opinion of that, and since ye do why I'll thank ye not to mention the name of the man to me, Lady Marjorie!" cried the Duchess, irate and bristling.

"Well, well, The Countess shrugged her shoulders indulgently. "I beg your pardon," she said coolly. "You don't approve of it, of course; but remembering the interest which I consider it only my duty to take in Marjorie, my stepdaughter, I must venture to repeat that I think it a great pity—very much to the regret indeed. She has rejected him, I think, the silly girl! I have noticed that they have not been together the last day or so and she has looked perfectly wretched. I have no doubt that she is very fond of him. I suppose these nonsensical notions of hers got in the way. But pray excuse me, I am forgetting how much you dislike the subject. I will only hope, I am sure that you will succeed in getting her off your hands more satisfactorily in Ireland," concluded the Countess sweetly. She sailed gracefully to the door and fired a parting shot over her shoulder as she opened it. "Foolish little thing, I expect she is crying her eyes out now," she said. "I don't wish to alarm you, my dear Countess, but do you know, if you succeed in getting Marjorie to Ireland I fancy you will soon have Barrington there too. He is not the sort of man to give up anything, he has set his heart on, and as I told you before, you may remember he is simply infatuated with her."

The Countess' penetration—a quality which seldom failed her—had not failed her in the present case. Up in her room into which she had impetuously rushed, locking the door behind her, Marjorie lay sobbing great passionate, exhausting sobs that shook her from head to foot. Rage, mortification, fear, misery were all warring in her one distracted tumult of emotion. Had Ireland and her grandmother's house meant a veritable cell and handcuffs she could not have shrunk away from the prospect of it with more dread and affrighted apprehension; the thought of her leaving Castle Marling was anguish enough, but both were for the instant blunted in the suffering of a more poignant sensation. Marjorie had no name for the wrath and chagrin which maddened her when she thought of Barrington.

She had seen the kiss and the embrace and heard the last few words which had passed between the two outside the window of the oak parlor while she stood hidden in the shadow. He had pretended to love her, had dared to step over the gulf which lay between them, had presumed to tell her so; and all the time there had been this woman—so beautiful, so much more beautiful than herself; this woman whom it seemed that he would have married once, whom he would like to marry now, only that for some mysterious reason it was too late. Oh the acidity, the treachery, the hypocrisy of it all. He had tried to make a fool of her—of her, Marjorie Wynn—and—unbearable thought—he had almost succeeded, for he had made her believe that he did love her, and because she believed it had made her almost sorry for him. Yes, she had humiliated herself by really being sorry for him and that in spite of his presumption and audacious absurdity.

It was insufferable—not to be borne! She raged up and down her room, when her sobbing was over with burning cheeks and blazing eyes. What was she to do? Where was she to go? She would never, if she could help it, see him again. What a little spiteful fool she had been to believe that he loved her. She would never have married him; it was utterly impossible, ridiculous, but to be made a fool of, laughed at. No doubt he had told this woman, whoever she was, all about it; no doubt they had laughed at it together. No she would never see him again, and she would never go to Ireland—anything, no matter what, was preferable to life with the Dowager. And if she stayed at Castle Marling they would somehow force her to go. Oh that cruelly delayed letter from the Continent, when would it come? It might be only a few days longer; it surely could not be more and yet in those few days they might drag her away. To whom could she go for assistance and protection? To whom had she a right to go? Marjorie stopped suddenly, midway across the room, her heart throbbed high, her mouth set resolutely, the color flushing from her cheeks.

"Loftus!" she said, whispering and drawing her breath hard. "He told me to remember him if I wanted a friend, and—he told me to let him know if I were in trouble. I do want a friend, and I am in trouble. Besides it is his right—I am to be his wife—it is his right to take care of me. I won't be tortured, I won't be humiliated, I won't go to Ireland, I'll go to Loftus."

The Power of Association

By RUTH CAMERON

YESTERDAY morning I sat down to do some sewing in the happiest of moods. And then, as I reached up my hand and took up the piece of sewing, there swept over me such a feeling of depression and unhappiness that it actually seemed to me as if dark clouds had shut out the bright morning sun.

And what do you think was the reason? Simply this—the last time I had weaved on that particular article I had been in that mood of depression and discouragement, and when I took it up again the wonderful power of association momentarily brought back the mood.

What a tremendous force this power of association is! It almost seems as if some actual force like electricity were lurking in that bit of sewing, ready to come to life at my touch.

And what wonderful power it has to make us happy or unhappy, to lend charm or destroy it! The robin's morning call seems a very sweet and happy sound to me. My mother hates it. It seems that one summer when she was a little girl she was very ill. Night after night she lay awake, tortured by pain, and then, just at dawn when the pain subsided and she might have fallen blessedly asleep, the robins would begin to call each other and keep it up until sleep had been driven away. That was over sixty years ago, and still she remembers when she hears that sound.

The power of association has much to do with our preferences in the way of names—more, I think, than we realize. If we really try I believe we can trace most of our likes and dislikes in this matter back to people who have borne the name. For instance, I have a deep love for the name David. I love to hear it spoken, not because I think it is musical or beautiful in itself, but for the sake of a boy who bore it. Perhaps you know him, too, for he is a little citizen of the world of letters, the David of Barrie's "Little White Bird."

Taste and smell are two of the humblest of our senses. They seem purely physical, whereas hearing and sight are more mental. And yet taste and smell are the commonest channels of this tremendous force of association.

Do you remember in Cranford when Peter's father flogged him for some trick and he ran away? "I was in the storeroom helping my mother to make cowslip wine," writes dear Miss Mattie in describing his dreadful occasion. "I cannot abide the wine nor the scent of the flowers. They turn me sick and faint as they did that day when Peter came in."

And again, is there anything more powerful in all Kipling than that wonderful refrain, "The smell of the wattle at Lichtenburg, riding in the rain?"

Yes, it certainly is a wonderful thing, this power of association. Nor is it just dreamers like me who think so. Already the scientists have made wonderful use of it in the grilling of criminals and in the treatment of nervous diseases. Who knows what they will do with it before the twentieth century is past.

Archibald a catcher, who has been with the Buffalo International League team, is anxious for a try-out with London. He has written for a chance with Deneau's Dudes.

Frank Shaughnessy, manager of the Ottawa Baseball club, who went to Fort Wayne for the Senators last week, has landed his first new pitcher. The latest addition to the burbling corps of the Canadian League champions is none other than Walter Mullin, a younger brother of George Mullin the famous gunner of the Detroit Tigers.

WOMAN'S MOST SUCCESSFUL MEDICINE

Known All Over The World—Known Only For The Good It Has Done.

We know of no other medicine which has been so successful in relieving the suffering of women, or received so many genuine testimonials, as has Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"I have always had pains in the abdomen and a weakness there and often after meals a soreness in my stomach. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done me much good. I am stronger, digestion is better and I get on with my ambition. I have encouraged many mothers of families to take it as it is the best remedy in the world. You can publish this in the papers." HE DIED OF KIDNEY DISEASE

How often we hear of these sad cases. The back-pains and headache were noticed—but not treated. Dizzy spells, frequent calls and languid condition appeared, but nothing was done till the disease was far advanced. Cure invariably results from Dr. Hamilton's Pills. They restore perfect health, destroy every symptom of disease, build up constitutions that defy further outbreaks. Because purely vegetable and free from injurious materials, no remedy equals Dr. Hamilton's Pills for kidney and liver complaint. Sold in 25c boxes by all dealers.
