The Maiden's Choice
OR, THE LAIRD OF BIRKENLEUCH

A Tale of the Covenanters.

The spot among the Ochils which he had then chosen as the scene of his solitary existence was remotely situated amidst the craggy heights of a bare rocky character; but the little vale or haugh was in singular contrast to the sterile surface around it, for while all else was bare and desolate it was covered by a fertile soil which sent up an annual crop of luxuriant grass, and thereby gave sign that under cultivation it would produce abundant crops.

But being small in extent, and placed in the bosom of an extensive tract of bare moorland, no one had hitherto found it worth while to till this small portion of generous soil, which was further neglected on account of its character—it being regarded by the people in the district as a special haunt of the fairies, who would do harm to any one intruding on their domain.

Richard Wayland, annoyed by no such fears, saw in the haugh a piece of ground the tilling of which would yield him subsistence, and, having taken up his residence, he obtained a cow and two goats, and raised a fence round a portion in front of his cave to serve as a garden.

For many months he had dwelt thus as a recluse, secretly feared by the people near, who, as was to be expected, invested him with supernatural qualities, and did not care to come much in contact with him. Richard designed, fostered this superstitious belief, for thereby he would have less chance of being molested.

For months, we say, he had lived in his solitude, keeping green and tender, by sad, silent meditation, the deep wound of his heart, and looking forward to no life more active or useful. Different thoughts might have come upon him when time had done its usual work of easing the smart; and when he was less bowed down by his crushing sorrow, the springs of his youth might have risen up to protest against the idle, useless, and joyless existence he was leading, but as yet he was wrapped up in his mantle of sorrow, and was a prey to those bitter hopeless feelings which had prompted him to leave the society of his fellows and become a recluse.

But how completely was all changed now! The snow-storm which had made the accidental means of leading Helen to the Baronet to his retreat, had, as it were, obliterated for ever the grief and gloom of his heart, and dispelled the desire to live on in solitude. Had some power now condemned him to remain a hermit he would like Cain, have felt it a punishment greater than he could bear. Love and hope were restored to him, and in greater measure than before he had lost them. An honourable birth, a high station were now his, and he had bid a glad farewell to the desiring gloom in which he had been enshrouded. The dense cloud which had seemed so impenetrable had vanished from his life, and the prospect had become brighter and fairer than ever.

The imprisonment in the cavern was for all three an imprisonment singularly endurable. We have all heard of love in a cottage, but here was love in a cave, and billing and cooing all day long. The presence of a third party in the person of the Baronet was not felt by Richard and Helen as a great interruption to their felicity, for Sir Gilbert could enter so warmly and heartily into their feelings that he often helped rather than hindered their outflow. At times, too, he would retire for hours together into the adjoining compartment, under pretence of seeing to the comfort of Fattie, and on these occasions the lovers were left together, to drink delicious draughts of their brimming cup of love.

It was altogether a sweet, romantic incarceration, and had it been wholly without alloy they would have cared little for the predicted character of the snow storm. But the sad, painful image of Walter Elliot pining in captivity of a very different kind constantly intruded itself, and made them reproach themselves for being so happy while he was suffering so severely for their sakes.

Another subject of anxiety to Sir Gilbert and Helen was the suspicion attaching to Richard of being the murderer of Jabez Cringan. Circumstances were strongly against him, and unfortunately he had no means of proving his innocence. That innocence tempted him to laugh at the matter himself, and treat it with utter indifference, but Sir Gilbert, knowing well the vindictive character of Charlie Allan, and suspecting strongly that in addition to malicious motives he had a personal and private motive to make him answerable for the crime—had great uneasiness in its contemplation, and looked forward with considerable anxiety to the time when the youth would again openly appear at Brankswood.

"I haven't a shadow of a doubt that Alan himself is concealed in the miser's murder," observed Richard on one occasion, when the oft-considered subject came up in conversation.

"I'm as sure of it as if I had seen the deed done," returned Sir Gilbert. "But that will make him a' the mair eager ta saddle it on you."

"He can't succeed," cried the youth. "There is no positive evidence against me."

"Nothing but circumstantial evidence, and that has hanged a man afore now, Richie."

"Oh, Sir Gilbert, this is 'dreadful to think of," exclaimed Helen, in dismay.

Richard laughed at the fears of both, and would not believe that justice was so blind as to punish the innocent for the guilty.

At the end of four weeks the iron hand of the monarch of frost relaxed his grasp, and one night a rushing wind sprang up, the noise of which the captives joyfully recognized as a fresh south breeze. They returned to rest in the eager expectation of seeing a prospect of deliverance on the morrow.

Before the day dawned they were startled from their slumber by a thundering sound overhead, accompanied by a long hurrying noise, and then all was profoundly and preternaturally still. But the smoke from their fire found no longer an outlet at the orifice above, and soon spread with suffocating influence through the cave.

WORTHY OF IMITATION.—The Mayor of Charleston, South Carolina, "got off" rather a neat joke the other day, at the expense of some of the regular visitors of his court. Immediately after taking his seat in the morning, he ordered the doors of the room to be closed, and the crowd of idle spectators, after enjoying the proceedings, were called upon for an explanation of their presence. Some were on business, and some for mere transient curiosity. These were excused, but the habitual loafers or valets were fined two or three dollars, or as many days confinement. The police officer since then, has lost all its charms for loafers.

AN UNPARLIAMENTARY FRACAS.—Accounts from New South Wales describe a disgraceful scene in the Legislative Assembly. Mr. Lee, member for Maitland, walked from the Ministerial benches to the Opposition side and assaulted Mr. McPherson. McPherson went out of the chamber, got a horsewhip, and on Lee afterward entering the library struck him across the face with it. A regular "rough and tumble" followed. Police were sent for, the House adjourned, and great excitement prevailed. Next day the House by resolution directed the Attorney-General to prosecute both members.

The fund for the proposed monument to the late Mr. McGee is being largely subscribed to, and will contain the name of every citizen of Guelph.
