Adam Graeme, of Mossgray. By Mrs. Oliphant.

"What makes you think there is anything to trust you with, Hope?" said Mrs. Oswald.
"Oh. I know—because you will not let me speak, and say always, 'hus h' hush!' Mother do tell me; what sis the matter with Helen?—what sils her?"
"Nothing alls her, Hope—she is perfectly well."

"Nothing alls her, Hope—she is perfectly well."
Hope became very impatient.
"But you know you don't mean that, mamma; there is something wrong; and would it not be better to tell me than to be sivays saying 'hush!"
Mrs. Oswald smiled.
"It is not always so easy to tell, Hope;—for instance, why do you call me 'mamma' one moment, and 'mother' the next!"
"Oh, that is easy," said Hope; "because the girls at school say mamma, and it tounds best there; and when I come home, William says mother, and it is home like, nd—and the right word; but I forget somesmes, and mix them at first. So now, mother, if you please, tell me about Helen Buchanan."

Buchanan."

"You are a very pertinacious gir!," said Mrs. Oswald; "but remember, Hope, if I lill you this, that you must be very prudent and sensible, and never mention it again."

"I will be very prudent and sensible, nother," promised Hope, with a reservation.

Mrs. Gawald hesitated still; the impatient Hope volunteered to thread her mother's refractory needle, and urged her petition still more warmly. A slight fugitive smile rossed the good mother's face—then she be-rofractory needle, and urged her petition still more warmly. A slight fugitive smile crossed the good mother's face—then she became very grave.

"Holen's father died long ago; he used to be very fond of you when you were a baby, Hose; but you cannot remember him."

"Oh, yes; was he not very thin and pale, mother, with a whits high forehead, like Mossgray? I do mind him.

"Hush, Hope! you are interrupting me now. He was a very delicate man, this poor Mr. Bachanan; but he was not at all like Mossgray, and when he died, your father and he were a good friends.

"Yes, mother, I know that," said the disappointed Hope; "but is that all?"

"Wat a little; do not he so impatient?" said Mrs. Oswald. "And foolish people say that your father's sternness killed this delicate man. I believe Mrs. Buchanan thinks so still.

cate man. I believe Mrs. Buchanan this so still.

Hope started.

"Then Helen will not be friends with us because my father was poor Mr. Buchanan's enemy—is that it, mother?"

"No, Hope, that is not it. Helen knows that her father was a weak man, and Helen is a wise, good girl, and would not do anything so foolish; but Helen is only a poor school-mistress, Hope, and your brother William, you know will be rich."

"Oh, mannan!" exclaimed Hope, elapping her hands as the conjunction of these two names threw sudden light upon the mystery, "are they going to be married!"

"I very much fear you are not the sensible person you call yourself," said her mother; "your father will not let them be married. Hope," blickly fore became suddenly liam any harm," said Hope, looking up brightly, "though if my father would not speak to him—but he would, mother—he could not help it."

"My dear, I have known your father longer than you have," said Mrs. Oswald; "and besides, Hope, Helen Buchanan would not consent if your father did not consent; she is as firm as he is."

"Then it is all because everybody is proud, mother," said Hope, turning away disconsolately, "and would rather make other folk unhappy than give up their own will."

"There are some things in the world, Hope," said Mrs. Oswald, "that are of more importance than oven making puople happy."

"I know, mother," said Hope; "it is best to be right always, whether we are happy or not; but this is not right, I am sure—my father does not know—there is nobody in Fendie like Helen Buchanan!"

Mrs. Oswald sighed.

"You must not speak so of your father, Hope, he knows what is right better than you do."

Hope, he knows what is right better than you do."

Hope looked skeptical; those frank instinctive impulses of the young heart, which had no complicated mesh of secret motives to hinder his prompt out going, were perhaps better guides after all than the groping wordly wisdom of older minds; wisdom whose wary steps are supposed to be cuided by the caution of clear-sightedness, when it is only the timid caution of the blind.

"But I may go to see Helen Buchanan may I not, mother?" asked Hope, after a pause.

may I not, month pause.

"Surely, Hope; I have no wish to restrain you, and your father will not, I dare say, unless you speak of her again before him, as you did yeaterday; and you must be cautious of that, for it only aggravates your father's prejudice and vexes William, without doing any good."

"And I am not to speak about Helen at unloss you speak of her again before him, as you did yesterday; and you must be cautious of that, for it only aggravates your father's prejudice and vexes William, without doing any good."

"And I am not to speak about Helen at all?" said Hope.

"No, my dear, not now. I do not forbid you praising Helen as frankly as you blame Adelaide Fendie—and you must restrain that last propensity of yours a little, Hope — but do it cautiously and warily, and let me see something of this wisdom and good sense which Miss Swinton has discovered. You see I trust you, Hope."

"I will be very careful, mother, no fear, but may I go to see Helen now?"

"Well, then, come to the waterside, mother: I want to see Mesgre Irving. Come!"

The indulgent mother laid aside her work and went.

Friarside was a farm-house standing on a little eminence at some distance from the water, and Maggie Irving was the farmer's daughter. She was a year older than Hope Oswald, and one of her Fendie intimates. The house was only a little out of the direct road to Mossgray, and Mrs. Oswald and her daughter turned up the winding by-way to make their first visit there.

Matthew Irving of Friarsford was wealthy and had some amultion. He was exceedingly desirous to give his children a good education, and with the masculine part of the house was fortunate. She was the only daughter: especial pains, and care, and labor had been expended upon hier training, and the father and mother, exulting over their accomplished girl, thought the process a perfectly astisfactory and successful one. Maggie had been expended upon hier training, and the father and mother, exulting over their accomplished girl, shought the process a perfectly astisfactory and successful one. Among the pains and aches cured with marvelous rapidity with Dr. Thomas Eclectric Oil, is earache. The young are especially subject to it, and the desirability of this Oil as a family remedy is enhanced by the fact that it is admirably adapted not only to the above ailment, but also to the hurts, disorders of the bowels, and affections of the throat, in which the young are specially subject.

Helen is a gentle, "Because she is poor." Helen is a gentle woman, mother I and because her father did wrong! But that is not Helen's fault. If my father did wrong, no one would blame William or me. "Take care, Hope; you are treeding of dangerous ground," said Mrs. Oswald; "and though it is not Helen's fault, your father has made up his mind, and William must submit;" "But mother," said Hope doubfully, "William is old—William is a man."
