

cribe its soil and agricultural advantages, as again what it affords in the way of big game and other sport.

"Perhaps the particular quality of its beauty is best indicated by the remark of a gifted Bostonian, a great traveller, who spent several days with us at Edenhorne, last summer, as he was concluding a journey round the world: 'I have seen much, but nothing that I can compare with this, save, perhaps, the Vale of Cashmere.'

Lake Windermere, looking south from Edenhorne.
