tribe of Hurons had a village there and upon the high headland buried their dead. They gave to every locality or stream some appropriate name, and the River of Islands described that at whose mouth Goderich is now located. The members of the Canada Company, which purchased all the western portion of the Huron tract, seemed to be possessed with a mania for perpetuating their names and robbed the stream of its not only appropriate but musical cognomen to tickle the pride of a Mr Maitland. It and the Saugeen were the two great highways by which the Hurons entered the wilderness to the east, which up to a comparatively recent period was prolific in game. At a later period when England and France struggled for possession of all this northern territory, and to accomplish their several ambitions, stirred up strife between the tribes, the fierce Iroquois of the east, alded by the guns which the white man furnished, exterminated the Hurons, and for a century it remained unpeopled save by hunting parties of the Choctaws, from the northwest. The Canada Company early recognized the mouth of the Menesetring as the natural site for a town, and doubtless thruits agent. Galt, and the eccentric Dr. Dunley, had an idea of its topography, So the form which the future town should take was not left to chance, but unique. Such a plan was possible upon the level plane that extends south from the headland bluff overlocking the great lake, and south from the high banks whence the observer locks down upon the waters of the river, circling about the several islands in its broad channel.
