of quarrel with The Spectator reporters, the certainly rode with Mr. Cameron in a hack last July 12, but he wouldn't go so far as to say he had his arms around the editor's neck. He had called Mr. Cameron a farmer editor, but that was no disgrace. He didn't say he wasn't a citizen; he did say that he knew more about agricultural matters than running a paper. He really objected to the way Mr. Cameron earned his salary when writing about him.

Plaintiff's counsel pointed out to the furnity, the large circulation of the paper, etc., and said the action was not brought to make money, and that whatever money was awarded would be given to charity.

An Offer to Drop the Case.

Mr. Maybee said if the defendants would pay the expenses, publish an apology and retract what it had said the action would be withdrawn. He made this additional offer, that if The Spectator would retract the statements the plaintiff would gladly avail himself of the services of His Lordship's assistance to frame an apology that would set the plaintiff would gladly avail himself of the services of His Lordship's assistance to frame an apology that would set the plaintiff was prepared to prove the falsity of the defendants' insimuations.

Judge MacMahon interrupted to ask if the case was really so serious that the parties concerned could not accommodate one another.

Mr. Staunton replied that the defendants had put in The Spectator all that the plaintiff had sent them. He did not wish to press on Mr. Teetzel any more than he could avoid. He thought the plaintiff took the paper's strictures too seriously.

Minor Matters.

One of the visitors at Census Commissioner W. S. Moore's office this morning was Rev. George F. Salton. The reverend gentleman was looking for pointers for his next Sunday's caseman.

Maintained that never since Confederation had an attempt been made to talk the Government out of power or obstruct public business. The object of the bill, he went on, was reasonably plain. The Government intended to bring in a redistribution bill, and while he had no objection whatever to every part of the province receiving its just representation in the Legislature, he did object to a bill of this nature being introduced under the cover of a measure to extend the life of the Parliament. As to the argument, that lit gentleman was looking for pointers for his next Sunday's sermon. He is going to preach on census-taking.
