all he can. Everybody is in business to get as much as he can But what I do grouch at is the man who wants to give us as little as he can. The man who is underworking is at present a deadly canker that is eating out the heart, of industry in England."

This remark was made by A. J. Hobson, J.P., L.L.D., vice-president of the Imperial Chamber of Commerce, ex-lord mayor of Sheffield, and one of Great Britain's leading business men in the course of an address at the Canadian Club luncheon yesterday on "Industrial Conditions in England." Mr. Hobson is an eloquent, convincing and forceful speaker, and his reputation attracted over five hundred to the King

"The general result of everybody do-ng his best," Mr. Hobson continued, would be to bring down the cost of living, and if we could only get that true economic principle into the heads of the Labor leaders, we should be in for a better time. What we all have

Mr. Hobson went on to say that the British government had at present a stock of two million bales of wool which had been held so long that the market had been missed, and in that way the cost of clothing had been in-directly increased. "As regards coal," he said, "I must frankly state that it is the one thing that I am not anxious to see the government release its control of," said Mr. Hobson. He explained that if coal was allowed to sell at the ed, it would mean that the colliers would get such high wages that they would lose all interest in their work, and materially decrease their output, which he said was low enough at present. This condition was occasioned by the fact that Europe is extremely short of coal, and there is hardly any price which they are not willing to bid for

"The threat of one of the miners unions of a coal strike to set the world back, is only buncombe," said Mr. Hobson, referring to the threatened coal strike. "The total resources of the strike organizations in Britain just now could carry them only five weeks be called and he dare not face the strike, which he knows must end in a
