The synopsis is a comprehensive survey of the liquor question as affected by legislation in the various states, and it yields instruction to those who are interested in this important problem, The laws devised by the different states vary from prohibition in Maine to almost anything in New Jersey. They indicate how each state has, in its own way, tried to solve the problem of controlling and restricting the traffic in liquor, and they show, norsover, that the liquor laws of the states are as varied as the divorce laws, each state enacting such legislation as seemed proper for it, without regard to the legislation

While Mr. Lyman does not assume anything more than the facts and statutes he records his opinion, as a fair deduction from the different laws, that "the principle of local option in connexion with high license is growing in favor in all parts the country, while absolute prohibition on the wane.
