The Canadian Content Commandos know

anonymous

It had been an anonymous tip. "Hello? Canadian Content Commandos head office. May I help you?"

"Is this Christopher Chesterfield?"

"Eh. Who're you?"

"It doesn't matter. What matters is that Barbara Frum may be practising anti-Canadian activities."

"Barbara Frum may be practicing anti-Canadian activities, eh?"

"I was at a cocktail party last night and I overheard a conversation between Frum and Mr. Dress-up. This is a direct quote: 'I've got a recipe for every kind of soup, from A to Zee.'"

"That is serious. The Zed word, eh? I'll send someone out to investigate right away."

"Hey, don't I get some sort of reward?"

"Sorry, but this is Canada, Land of the Shoestring Budget."

An hour had passed, and I still hadn't sent anybody out to investigate. It wasn't as if I hadn't tried, but each and every one of my employees had a new and colourful excuse:

"Sorry, I've got to compile a list of the ten worst Canadian sitcoms ever created."

"Maybe when I'm done this portrait of Al Waxman."

"I'd really love to, but I've got to arrange the disco version of 'O Canada.'"

"I've got to compile a list of the ten worst sitcoms ever created."

Finally, I decided that the only person who was going to investigate would be me—Christopher Chesterfield. I looked up Barbara Frum's address in the phone book, copied it down on a piece of scrap paper, and banged out of the office. Three seconds later, I hopped on the energy-efficient staff motorcycle, and gunned the baby into action.

I guess I shouldn't have been too surprised that the address on the piece of paper coincided with the one on the converted tool-shed. The CBC is yet another great Canadian institution operating on a shoestring budget. I seriously began to wonder if old Barbara was even being paid minimum wage.

The two warped metal doors on the tool-shed were held together with a cheap combination lock. The lock was going to be easier than maple sugar. But, ripping the rusted doors out would be even easier. I succeeded at the latter the help of my trusty hacksaw.

I wasn't sure about what I'd be expecting, but what lay before me was beyond my wildest imaginings. The walls, ceiling, and floor of the tool-shed were literally plastered with life-size posters of Bruce Springsteen. The only furniture in the room was a low glass coffee table, a t.v. and a mattress. The coffee table was crowded with a bottle of ketchup, six cold hot dogs, a plate of French fries, baseball cards, and bubblegum wrappers. The t.v. had been left on, flickering mindless soaps at the empty room. There wasn't a stitch of bedding on the mattress, but it was covered with a giant American flag instead. A pair of Army boots stood guard by the doorway. I had never seen anything like them. I was still staring at those army boots when something poked the small of my back.

"You have the right to remain silent..."

I broke into hysterical laughter and, without a second thought, brained whoever was behind me with the hacksaw. I turned around then, and set my eyes on the unconscious body of Barbara Frum.

"Hahahaha," I snickered. "They only say that in the States. Ever thought of reading the Canadian rights, eh? You've been watching too many American cop shows, my friend. Remember: The week of the United States of America is the root of all evil. Expatriation pays even less than the CBC. The Canadian Content Commandos know, eh."
