It was a truly awesome sight as the Gazette ran its own covert Winter Carnival for enlightened staff people. Roxanne MacLeod slashed across the slightly corrugated floor of the Gazette to hand her relay poodle to Gisele Marie Baxter, who promptly dared to toss it at Paul Withers. Since he was getting those ex-citations for having double parked his little doggie, the air-borne mutt was promptly lateroled to Llewellyn Butterfield II, who was busy explaining to Rusty that one is a lonely number. It bounced, unheeded, along the left-over Horrids and Sara Gordons, while Michael McCarthy gleefully recorded the carnage for a future staff box. While the relay lay up in the air (in the corner, really), the Gazette's wild wild wild beer bash began, with Kevin Little ducking out early after starting to see pink hoopsters floating in front of Vicki Grant. Greg Dennis lost the chug-a-lug contest to the hot flash from the Yukon, Mary Lou Hendry, although he later protested to judge Michael Brennan that she unfairly used the confusion over Wendy's unknown last name to pour her drinks all over Ken Burke's lap. "Shut up," Michael answered. "Besides, he did that himself while making a speech to Lori Grant and Cathryn Ricketts on the good points of Thomas Vradenburg being in Ottawa and not occupying this space in time." "Sounds boring," said Cathy McDonald as she wrestled with the problems of Dave in a best two-out-of-three falls match to decide who would tell Manaj Vohra what they had done with his Volvo. As it was late in the party, David Matsch won, and Bruce Galloway adjudged his victory "outstanding." Meanwhile, Gazette members all over the world broke off training for the hockey game against the Engineers, with Rick Bertrand attempting to stick-handle Jeff Roy past the ever-vigilant Mike Delory after they'd all had a few too many. But they weren't worried - they knew that they had a secret weapon for the big game, a pack of TNT called Judy Lee.
