Sir Campbell asked my opinion on the subject. I said I was not aware that the Canadian short-wave project had been revived. There was, however, nothing new about it. A House of Commons committee had recommended the erection of such a station a year or two ago, and the proposal had received a good deal of public support. If it were put up in Canada, I would think it desirable that the Canadian Government should pay the whole cost and take the responsibility.

Sir Campbell referred to the organization which had been established in the United Kingdom for dealing with broadcast propaganda on the Continent, particularly in Germany and Italy. It was under his general charge. He was responsible to the Minister of Information, was in official touch with the Foreign Secretary and Secret Intelligence work of the Foreign Office, and was in charge of the B.B.C.'s actual European propaganda broadcasts. It was necessary to have a skilled organization, not only with knowledge of German, Italian and other tongues, but with a background of secret information so that they could know what to say and what not to say. Sir Campbell then went on to suggest that as an alternative to Great Britain putting up the money for the Canadian station, if that were decided on, he might be able to bring out a technical and Intelligence unit who could carry on the work to be done here and train others for their
