

THE EVENING TIMES, ST. JOHN, N. B., FRIDAY, AUGUST 30, 1907.

Fall and Winter Overcoats, Toppers, Three-quarter Coat and Long Coat. All styles and Progress Brand to insure quality. All at Union Prices—that means the Lowest in the city.

UNION CLOTHING CO.

26 and 28 Charlotte Street,
Old Y. M. C. A. Building.

ALEX. CORBET, Manager

"AS A MAN SOWS."

BY HELEN WALLACE

Author of "THE GREATEST OF THESE," "THEIR HEARTS' DESIRE, ETC."

(Continued)

"Some hold that no two people are absolutely alike, but really we have here on this very spot a remarkable proof to the contrary. Really, my wife, Mrs. Thistlethwaite, Ashe bowed, 'and I have had quite a shock—really a shock—the likeness is so surprising.'"

"My dear Henry, the likeness is absolute, said Mrs. Thistlethwaite with a sort of steamhammer weight and force which rendered dissent or qualification impossible."

"Indeed? One hears of these things," said Ashe carelessly; "but—er—who?" His eyes apparently roving vaguely about the terrace.

"Perhaps you cannot see her from where you are sitting, but that tall young lady with the—er—"

"The hair is red, Henry."

"Yes, my dear, precisely—with the red hair, standing there beside the parapet."

"Yes, what about her," said Ashe, conscious of a quickened pulse.

"You'll hardly credit it, but she's startlingly like—"

"Absolutely, Henry."

"Yes, my dear, absolutely like a girl whose case has deeply interested us."

"If it weren't for the difference dress makes, I would say she is the girl," said Mrs. Thistlethwaite, who had now got her eyes again into play.

"My wife and I take a deep interest—indeed my wife has quite devoted herself to a charitable institution in our neighborhood for girls. She has been quite a mother to them. Indeed, thanks to my wife, it occupies quite a unique position now; you would be surprised, sir, at the number of deputations coming to inquire into its management."

"I can quite believe it," said Ashe suavely, with a glance which was in itself a compliment toward the lady, who sat like a Buddha receiving homage, "and this special case?"

"Ah, a very sad one, Henry."

"Yes, my dear, very sad indeed. You see, the idea is to take friends and—er—nameless children, who would otherwise be brought up with the poorest taint of the workhouse on them, train them in a plain, healthy way, and give them a fair start and the prospect of an honest livelihood."

"Mr. Thistlethwaite might have been reading from an annual report."

"And this girl you were speaking of?"

"Mrs. Thistlethwaite now took up the parable, 'Dried herself on what should have been her shiny—her extraordinary appearance with that unfortunate hair, her speech, her manner, many little things which suggested that in a disreputable way she was probably connected with a good family. Again and again I strove to show her, as Henry will bear me out—'

"You did everything, my dear, everything."

"That she should try to fit herself for her lot in life," went on the lady, "try to become like her companions, good, plain, hearty girls, and strive to avoid undue notice, which could only be to her detriment."

"She was always known as 'The Duchess,' put in Mr. Thistlethwaite."

"I couldn't rebuke the girls for calling her so. I told her it was but the due harvest of her pride and vanity and folly, but nothing would cure her of the silly notion that she was superior to the others. She was very quick at her lessons, I admit, but chiefly, I fear, from a vain, glorious desire to excel, and after a time I found it needful to deprive her of all books but the Book, as they were unfitted for her station. I did all I could for Isobel."

"Isobel—that was her name then?" said Ashe.

"Yes, it had been given by her mother—a poor unfortunate, I fear, who died in the workhouse from which we rescued the child. She had no other name of course, but all our girls in the same sad case we call Brown; it is safe and unremarkable. She had a violent temper too, as well as a most stubborn will, and partly because I thought she would be a trial to any mistress, but chiefly because I wanted to have her under my own eye, I kept her in the home long after the usual time, but with very great difficulty, as she importuned every one to get away; but the directors, I am glad to say, showed a proper spirit and recognized that my wishes should have some weight."

"It would have been strange indeed, had they done otherwise," murmured Mr. Thistlethwaite, but his spouse, now fully launched, rolled on her way, regardless of interruption. Ashe had no desire to interrupt her. It was seldom indeed, that she secured so good a listener. He lay back in his chair smiling faintly to himself as he caught a glimpse of a slim, dainty neck and a bright head beyond the ample shoulder of the intervening frau.

Suppose Miss Stormont were to look round, what would follow? The question was a poignant one. But Isobel after standing for a while rapt in the wide wonder of the scene, sauntered away to the farther end of the terrace out of sight. Ashe was relieved rather than otherwise. If there was to be any denouement he should prefer to keep the strings in his own hand.

CHAPTER XXII.

"When the question arose of what should be done with her," Mrs. Thistlethwaite was pointing on, "a vacancy had just occurred in the laundry; really it seemed quite a providence. I took pains to point out to her, and even to her, the company her to the scene of her new duties."

"Ah, it's that personal effort that tells I've known Mrs. Thistlethwaite go round the refectory at breakfast time and taste every bowl of porridge," put in Mr. Thistlethwaite.

"Heretic!" murmured Ashe.

"I may truly say I have done what I could," sighed Mrs. Thistlethwaite, "but," said Ashe, "your protegee did not recognize it."

"Recognize it? The ungrateful creature decried that very night—look advantage of a little extra liberty which had been given her, and though she had no money, and every inquiry made, not a trace could be found of her. Now, I daresay it seems impossible to you, but that young lady, the very image of that poor, lost creature."

"Which, I am certain, you will be considerate enough not to speak of," said Ashe. "It would be painful to any one to know that they had such a double as your very unsatisfactory protegee, and while as we with the world, Mr. Thistlethwaite, and I, of course, know," he shrugged his shoulders and "Henry's" eyes became lambent with satisfaction. "In this case and that supposition may be wholly put aside."

"Of course—of course—friends of yours' murmured Mr. Thistlethwaite, "but may I ask—who—"

"They are one of the best-known and the oldest of Scottish families," said Ashe, knowing that the hotel register would supply the information if he did not. "The Stormonts of Stormont, and the young lady is Sir David's only child. I must have a word with them by and by, but really I got interested in your institution—how all the difference to hear of such things at first hand. I'm afraid like most men, I simply chuck reports when I get them, but to hear all about it, as you tell it," with a glance at Mrs. Thistlethwaite.

"A man of remarkable breadth and grasp of mind—pity there aren't more like him," breathed Mr. Thistlethwaite, when Ashe had at last disengaged himself from his new friends—no easy task. "I've seldom met any one who showed such an intelligent appreciation of our labors—of your labors, my dear—and I would have thought him more worthy of your empty-headed fashionableness."

"You are always hasty my dear Henry. Now, if you had asked my opinion—"

The echo of the words came rumbling down the terrace after Ashe. He smiled, the young lady is Sir David's only child. His usual cool, even balance was a little upset by the amusing favor chance had done him. As by a turn of the kaleidoscope, his fragmentary facts and theories had suddenly taken definite shape. Doubt and conjecture were at an end. He seemed to tread on air.

Dinner was over before at last he got his opportunity. The terrace, more thronged than ever, was a blaze of electric light, beyond which night and space hung like a vast dim pall of purple, the long line of lights from Chillon and far away to Vevey lying like a golden embroidery along its hem. At the extreme end, in a nook screened off by palms, he found what he had been seeking. An empty chair, a book, a face, a hand, a head that Lady Stormont had been there, but for the moment Isobel sat alone by

Daily Fashion Hint for Times Readers.

THIS DRESS CAN BE WORN ALL THROUGH THE WINTER.

The jumper dress is evidently to be a favorite model this fall and winter, for many frocks of this mode are seen in the early lines of fall wear. In the early autumn, when the weather is too cool for late summer dresses and yet too moderate for dresses of winter materials, the jumper dress is the most practical that can be selected for either every day or dressy wear. Plain dresses are very effective developed along these lines and worn with plain white tailored pieces of linen or some other heavier weight wash fabric. The dress is very simple being what might be called a tailored frock, for all the seams are stitched flat, as are also the pleats in the shoulders, which make a becoming fulness at the waistline, and the cap sleeves allover in the back are devoid of trimming except for three buttons on the top of the arm and machine stitching. The neck is cut rounding and the jumper fastened in the front at the left side with a cluster of four bone buttons. The colors of the plaid are green and blue over-plaid with white. For winter wear the washable blouse might be replaced by one of some dark-hued plain material, such as albatross or nun's veiling, and the effect varied with light-colored guimpes in white or cream of this same material or silk.

THE SHOOTING AT ROCKLIFF RANGE

New Brunswickers Have Shot Well at the Preliminary Stage

Ottawa, Aug. 29.—It was ideal weather and good shooting was enjoyed by the competitors in the dominion rifle meet at Rockcliffe range today. The men from the maritime provinces did well in the first stage of the governor general's match. Nine Nova Scotians, five New Brunswickers and one P. E. Islander were among the first 150 in this stage and have secured places in the second stage when the governor general's prize, the plum of the meet, is shot.

The New Brunswickers who qualified are Mr. Carter, Moncton; Capt. Forbes, Chatham; Corp. Daigle, Chatham; Capt. E. A. Smith, St. John, and Pte. Currie, Woodstock.

Five of the Truro marksmen have qualified for the second stage of the governor general's.

Grand aggregate awarded to competitors with highest aggregate scores in the Bankers, Walker, McDougall, Dominion and first stage of governor general's medal and $20, Elmit, Ottawa, 333 points; 321; medal and $15, Sergt. Richardson, Vancouver, 320; 812; Pte. Williams, Annapolis, 319; 85 each, Capt. Jones, Summerside, 316; Pte. Haystead, Halifax, 310; Corp. Daigle, 72nd, Chatham, 308; Lieut. Shalmer, Annapolis, 307; Lieut. Creelman, Truro, 306.

First stage of the governor general's match, two five and six hundred yards, possible 105, the first 150 to compete in the second stage of 800 and 900 and at 1,400 yards.

First place was won by Major Richardson of the British team with 102 points; Lieut. Schaler, 62nd, Victoria, was second with 101; Sergt. Comber, of the British team, was third, with 100.

Maritime province men in the first 150 were: A. Carter, Moncton Rifle Association; Major Jones, Summerside; Sergt. Kennedy, 78th, Truro; Lieut. Creelman, 78th, Truro; Pte. Williams, 68th, Annapolis; Sergt. McCollum, 78th, Truro; Lieut. Semple, 78th, Truro; Lieut. Milner, 68th, Annapolis; Capt. Bishop, 69th; Pte. Haystead, 62nd, Halifax; Capt. Forbes and Corp. Daigle, 73rd, Chatham; Capt. E. A. Smith, St. John; Pte. Curtis, 67th, Woodstock; Capt. Blisset, 78th, Truro.

Tyros in second stage of governor general's, $4 each: Mr. Hird, Truro, 91 points; Pte. Armstrong, 69th, Halifax, 91 points; Mr. Gladwin, St. John, 91 points.

Gordon Highlanders match, teams of eight in first stage of governor general's: First prize of trophy and $45, won by 10th Grenadiers, Toronto, with 722; second, 48th Highlanders, Toronto, 832, with 744 points; 6th Vancouver, 824, with 744; Guards, Ottawa, 830, with 744 points.

Gillespie Challenge cup for teams of six having highest aggregate in Bankers, McDougall, Walker and Dominion—Cup and $30 won by 48th, Toronto, with 730 points.

London Merchants' cup, teams of eight men from each province, ranges 800 and 900 yards.

British Columbia match, first winning 880 with 688 points; Ontario second with 674 points; Nova Scotia third, winning 840 with 688 points; Quebec, 657 points; Alberta, 634 points; New Brunswick, 570 points.

M. E. AGAR WINS COLT

The lottery in aid of St. Ignace church, Peterville, Queens county, was drawn on Wednesday evening with the following result:

First prize, one and a half year colt, won by M. E. Agar, St. John; ticket 5254.

Second prize, barrel of flour, won by Timothy Sullivan, Quonomet; ticket 4576.

Third prize, caddy of tea, won by Dan Daley, No. 6 Clarence street, St. John; ticket 4139.

James Rourke has definitely announced his intention of being a candidate for St. John county at the approaching provincial general elections. He has already begun canvassing work.

the parapet, her eyes gazing into the darkness.

She turned with a slight start, but in the chequer-work of light and shade made by the broad palm fronds, even Ashe's keen scrutiny could not read her expression. He had known of the testament, company her to the scene of her new duties.

"Ah, it's that personal effort that tells I've known Mrs. Thistlethwaite go round the refectory at breakfast time and taste every bowl of porridge," put in Mr. Thistlethwaite.

"Heretic!" murmured Ashe.

"I may truly say I have done what I could," sighed Mrs. Thistlethwaite, "but," said Ashe, "your protegee did not recognize it."

"Recognize it? The ungrateful creature decried that very night—look advantage of a little extra liberty which had been given her, and though she had no money, and every inquiry made, not a trace could be found of her. Now, I daresay it seems impossible to you, but that young lady, the very image of that poor, lost creature."

"Which, I am certain, you will be considerate enough not to speak of," said Ashe. "It would be painful to any one to know that they had such a double as your very unsatisfactory protegee, and while as we with the world, Mr. Thistlethwaite, and I, of course, know," he shrugged his shoulders and "Henry's" eyes became lambent with satisfaction. "In this case and that supposition may be wholly put aside."

"Of course—of course—friends of yours' murmured Mr. Thistlethwaite, "but may I ask—who—"

"They are one of the best-known and the oldest of Scottish families," said Ashe, knowing that the hotel register would supply the information if he did not. "The Stormonts of Stormont, and the young lady is Sir David's only child. I must have a word with them by and by, but really I got interested in your institution—how all the difference to hear of such things at first hand. I'm afraid like most men, I simply chuck reports when I get them, but to hear all about it, as you tell it," with a glance at Mrs. Thistlethwaite.

"A man of remarkable breadth and grasp of mind—pity there aren't more like him," breathed Mr. Thistlethwaite, when Ashe had at last disengaged himself from his new friends—no easy task. "I've seldom met any one who showed such an intelligent appreciation of our labors—of your labors, my dear—and I would have thought him more worthy of your empty-headed fashionableness."

"You are always hasty my dear Henry. Now, if you had asked my opinion—"

The echo of the words came rumbling down the terrace after Ashe. He smiled, the young lady is Sir David's only child. His usual cool, even balance was a little upset by the amusing favor chance had done him. As by a turn of the kaleidoscope, his fragmentary facts and theories had suddenly taken definite shape. Doubt and conjecture were at an end. He seemed to tread on air.

Dinner was over before at last he got his opportunity. The terrace, more thronged than ever, was a blaze of electric light, beyond which night and space hung like a vast dim pall of purple, the long line of lights from Chillon and far away to Vevey lying like a golden embroidery along its hem. At the extreme end, in a nook screened off by palms, he found what he had been seeking. An empty chair, a book, a face, a hand, a head that Lady Stormont had been there, but for the moment Isobel sat alone by the parapet, her eyes gazing into the darkness.

She turned with a slight start, but in the chequer-work of light and shade made by the broad palm fronds, even Ashe's keen scrutiny could not read her expression. He had known of the testament, company her to the scene of her new duties.

"Ah, it's that personal effort that tells I've known Mrs. Thistlethwaite go round the refectory at breakfast time and taste every bowl of porridge," put in Mr. Thistlethwaite.

"Heretic!" murmured Ashe.

"I may truly say I have done what I could," sighed Mrs. Thistlethwaite, "but," said Ashe, "your protegee did not recognize it."

"Recognize it? The ungrateful creature decried that very night—look advantage of a little extra liberty which had been given her, and though she had no money, and every inquiry made, not a trace could be found of her. Now, I daresay it seems impossible to you, but that young lady, the very image of that poor, lost creature."

"Which, I am certain, you will be considerate enough not to speak of," said Ashe. "It would be painful to any one to know that they had such a double as your very unsatisfactory protegee, and while as we with the world, Mr. Thistlethwaite, and I, of course, know," he shrugged his shoulders and "Henry's" eyes became lambent with satisfaction. "In this case and that supposition may be wholly put aside."

"Of course—of course—friends of yours' murmured Mr. Thistlethwaite, "but may I ask—who—"

"They are one of the best-known and the oldest of Scottish families," said Ashe, knowing that the hotel register would supply the information if he did not. "The Stormonts of Stormont, and the young lady is Sir David's only child. I must have a word with them by and by, but really I got interested in your institution—how all the difference to hear of such things at first hand. I'm afraid like most men, I simply chuck reports when I get them, but to hear all about it, as you tell it," with a glance at Mrs. Thistlethwaite.

"A man of remarkable breadth and grasp of mind—pity there aren't more like him," breathed Mr. Thistlethwaite, when Ashe had at last disengaged himself from his new friends—no easy task. "I've seldom met any one who showed such an intelligent appreciation of our labors—of your labors, my dear—and I would have thought him more worthy of your empty-headed fashionableness."

"You are always hasty my dear Henry. Now, if you had asked my opinion—"

The echo of the words came rumbling down the terrace after Ashe. He smiled, the young lady is Sir David's only child. His usual cool, even balance was a little upset by the amusing favor chance had done him. As by a turn of the kaleidoscope, his fragmentary facts and theories had suddenly taken definite shape. Doubt and conjecture were at an end. He seemed to tread on air.

Dinner was over before at last he got his opportunity. The terrace, more thronged than ever, was a blaze of electric light, beyond which night and space hung like a vast dim pall of purple, the long line of lights from Chillon and far away to Vevey lying like a golden embroidery along its hem. At the extreme end, in a nook screened off by palms, he found what he had been seeking. An empty chair, a book, a face, a hand, a head that Lady Stormont had been there, but for the moment Isobel sat alone by the parapet, her eyes gazing into the darkness.

She turned with a slight start, but in the chequer-work of light and shade made by the broad palm fronds, even Ashe's keen scrutiny could not read her expression. He had known of the testament, company her to the scene of her new duties.

"Ah, it's that personal effort that tells I've known Mrs. Thistlethwaite go round the refectory at breakfast time and taste every bowl of porridge," put in Mr. Thistlethwaite.

"Heretic!" murmured Ashe.

"I may truly say I have done what I could," sighed Mrs. Thistlethwaite, "but," said Ashe, "your protegee did not recognize it."

"Recognize it? The ungrateful creature decried that very night—look advantage of a little extra liberty which had been given her, and though she had no money, and every inquiry made, not a trace could be found of her. Now, I daresay it seems impossible to you, but that young lady, the very image of that poor, lost creature."

"Which, I am certain, you will be considerate enough not to speak of," said Ashe. "It would be painful to any one to know that they had such a double as your very unsatisfactory protegee, and while as we with the world, Mr. Thistlethwaite, and I, of course, know," he shrugged his shoulders and "Henry's" eyes became lambent with satisfaction. "In this case and that supposition may be wholly put aside."

"Of course—of course—friends of yours' murmured Mr. Thistlethwaite, "but may I ask—who—"

"They are one of the best-known and the oldest of Scottish families," said Ashe, knowing that the hotel register would supply the information if he did not. "The Stormonts of Stormont, and the young lady is Sir David's only child. I must have a word with them by and by, but really I got interested in your institution—how all the difference to hear of such things at first hand. I'm afraid like most men, I simply chuck reports when I get them, but to hear all about it, as you tell it," with a glance at Mrs. Thistlethwaite.

"A man of remarkable breadth and grasp of mind—pity there aren't more like him," breathed Mr. Thistlethwaite, when Ashe had at last disengaged himself from his new friends—no easy task. "I've seldom met any one who showed such an intelligent appreciation of our labors—of your labors, my dear—and I would have thought him more worthy of your empty-headed fashionableness."

"You are always hasty my dear Henry. Now, if you had asked my opinion—"

The echo of the words came rumbling down the terrace after Ashe. He smiled, the young lady is Sir David's only child. His usual cool, even balance was a little upset by the amusing favor chance had done him. As by a turn of the kaleidoscope, his fragmentary facts and theories had suddenly taken definite shape. Doubt and conjecture were at an end. He seemed to tread on air.

Dinner was over before at last he got his opportunity. The terrace, more thronged than ever, was a blaze of electric light, beyond which night and space hung like a vast dim pall of purple, the long line of lights from Chillon and far away to Vevey lying like a golden embroidery along its hem. At the extreme end, in a nook screened off by palms, he found what he had been seeking. An empty chair, a book, a face, a hand, a head that Lady Stormont had been there, but for the moment Isobel sat alone by the parapet, her eyes gazing into the darkness.

She turned with a slight start, but in the chequer-work of light and shade made by the broad palm fronds, even Ashe's keen scrutiny could not read her expression. He had known of the testament, company her to the scene of her new duties.

"Ah, it's that personal effort that tells I've known Mrs. Thistlethwaite go round the refectory at breakfast time and taste every bowl of porridge," put in Mr. Thistlethwaite.

"Heretic!" murmured Ashe.

"I may truly say I have done what I could," sighed Mrs. Thistlethwaite, "but," said Ashe, "your protegee did not recognize it."

"Recognize it? The ungrateful creature decried that very night—look advantage of a little extra liberty which had been given her, and though she had no money, and every inquiry made, not a trace could be found of her. Now, I daresay it seems impossible to you, but that young lady, the very image of that poor, lost creature."

"Which, I am certain, you will be considerate enough not to speak of," said Ashe. "It would be painful to any one to know that they had such a double as your very unsatisfactory protegee, and while as we with the world, Mr. Thistlethwaite, and I, of course, know," he shrugged his shoulders and "Henry's" eyes became lambent with satisfaction. "In this case and that supposition may be wholly put aside."

"Of course—of course—friends of yours' murmured Mr. Thistlethwaite, "but may I ask—who—"

"They are one of the best-known and the oldest of Scottish families," said Ashe, knowing that the hotel register would supply the information if he did not. "The Stormonts of Stormont, and the young lady is Sir David's only child. I must have a word with them by and by, but really I got interested in your institution—how all the difference to hear of such things at first hand. I'm afraid like most men, I simply chuck reports when I get them, but to hear all about it, as you tell it," with a glance at Mrs. Thistlethwaite.

"A man of remarkable breadth and grasp of mind—pity there aren't more like him," breathed Mr. Thistlethwaite, when Ashe had at last disengaged himself from his new friends—no easy task. "I've seldom met any one who showed such an intelligent appreciation of our labors—of your labors, my dear—and I would have thought him more worthy of your empty-headed fashionableness."

"You are always hasty my dear Henry. Now, if you had asked my opinion—"

The echo of the words came rumbling down the terrace after Ashe. He smiled, the young lady is Sir David's only child. His usual cool, even balance was a little upset by the amusing favor chance had done him. As by a turn of the kaleidoscope, his fragmentary facts and theories had suddenly taken definite shape. Doubt and conjecture were at an end. He seemed to tread on air.

Dinner was over before at last he got his opportunity. The terrace, more thronged than ever, was a blaze of electric light, beyond which night and space hung like a vast dim pall of purple, the long line of lights from Chillon and far away to Vevey lying like a golden embroidery along its hem. At the extreme end, in a nook screened off by palms, he found what he had been seeking. An empty chair, a book, a face, a hand, a head that Lady Stormont had been there, but for the moment Isobel sat alone by the parapet, her eyes gazing into the darkness.

She turned with a slight start, but in the chequer-work of light and shade made by the broad palm fronds, even Ashe's keen scrutiny could not read her expression. He had known of the testament, company her to the scene of her new duties.

"Ah, it's that personal effort that tells I've known Mrs. Thistlethwaite go round the refectory at breakfast time and taste every bowl of porridge," put in Mr. Thistlethwaite.

"Heretic!" murmured Ashe.

"I may truly say I have done what I could," sighed Mrs. Thistlethwaite, "but," said Ashe, "your protegee did not recognize it."

"Recognize it? The ungrateful creature decried that very night—look advantage of a little extra liberty which had been given her, and though she had no money, and every inquiry made, not a trace could be found of her. Now, I daresay it seems impossible to you, but that young lady, the very image of that poor, lost creature."

"Which, I am certain, you will be considerate enough not to speak of," said Ashe. "It would be painful to any one to know that they had such a double as your very unsatisfactory protegee, and while as we with the world, Mr. Thistlethwaite, and I, of course, know," he shrugged his shoulders and "Henry's" eyes became lambent with satisfaction. "In this case and that supposition may be wholly put aside."

"Of course—of course—friends of yours' murmured Mr. Thistlethwaite, "but may I ask—who—"

"They are one of the best-known and the oldest of Scottish families," said Ashe, knowing that the hotel register would supply the information if he did not. "The Stormonts of Stormont, and the young lady is Sir David's only child. I must have a word with them by and by, but really I got interested in your institution—how all the difference to hear of such things at first hand. I'm afraid like most men, I simply chuck reports when I get them, but to hear all about it, as you tell it," with a glance at Mrs. Thistlethwaite.

"A man of remarkable breadth and grasp of mind—pity there aren't more like him," breathed Mr. Thistlethwaite, when Ashe had at last disengaged himself from his new friends—no easy task. "I've seldom met any one who showed such an intelligent appreciation of our labors—of your labors, my dear—and I would have thought him more worthy of your empty-headed fashionableness."

GREAT QUEBEC BRIDGE COLLAPSED YESTERDAY; EIGHTY-FOUR LIVES LOST

Big Span of World's Greatest Bridge Fell Yesterday Afternoon and Hurlled Workmen 180 Feet Down to Death.

QUEBEC, Aug. 29.—The great