

north of Canterbury, and again, on the eastern side of the river, north of Millville. Some of these would doubtless make, if polished, handsome rocks. The finest as well as the largest beds seen by us, however, are those east and northeast of the last named place, about the headwaters of the branches of the Beccaguimic. Here the rock is fine, compact and even-grained, of pale pink to flesh-red colour, and often conspicuously porphyritic. It is, however, unfavorably situated for removal.
