POETRY.

Peace on Earth.

BY THE NEW POET LAUREATE.

But not alone for those who still

Within the Mother-Land abide,

We deck the porch, we dress the ill,

And sing the psalm upon wide

But unto all of British blood—

Whether they cling to Ebert's Throne

Or far beyond the Western flood,

Have reared a Sceptre of their own.

And, half-regretful, years to win

Their way back home, and fondly claim

The rightful share of kith and kin

In Alfred's glory, Shakespeare's fame.

We pile the logs, we troll the stave,

We wait the tidings wide and far,

And spend the wish, on wild and ways,

To Southern Cross and Northern Star.

Yes! Peace, on earth, Atlantic strand!

Peace and good-will Pacific shore!

Across the waters stretch your hand,

And be our brothers more and more!

Race of our blood, in every clime!

Face of our race, by every sea!

To you we sing the Christmas rhyme,

For you we light the Christmas tree.

—From "In Veronica's Garden," by Alfred

Arnold.

SELECT STORY.

Wolfe the Ranger.

CHAPTER VII.—Continued.

But it was only abroad that questioners asked him. At home his disposition to talk about his roaming life, if disinclination it was, was fully respected. The Marchioness was the glad to have her prodigal home again to ask any questions, and Lady Ruth for all her sharp inquisitiveness, did not dare to.

"Dare" is the word, for before many days had passed all who came in contact with him recognized the fact that with all his frank and genial manner the Marquis was made of somewhat stern material, and the sudden flash of the dark eyes, or a swift glance indicated that underneath the good-tempered easy manner, lay more than a touch of the imperious Brakespeare nature.

If he gave an order it must be executed at once, and no questions must be asked. With servant or horse his way was the same. Obedience was acknowledged by a smile or a nod; disobedience, or the least sign of it, with a swift anger and sternness which was irresistible. Not a man in the vast place, from Bedford, the butler, to the smallest of the stable-boys, but few to do his bidding, and seemed more than repaid by the prompt thanks or the nod and smile.

The great chestnut, which had won an ill-repute for itself by about as bad a temper as ever a horse had the misfortune to own, and which invariably either kicked or shot off its rider, gave in to the Marquis after the first tussle, and would now, though only six days had passed, come to him at the word of call and stand like a statue to be mounted.

One of the first things the Marquis did was to fulfil his promise to Arol.

He rode off to Waverley, the large market-town, and bought a pony which was quiet and manageable, and yet possessed sufficient spirit and jumping qualities to clear a decent hedge, and by the boy by his side the Marquis, riding over the Buckinghamshire hills, and through the green valleys, seemed happier than anywhere else. Indeed, for Arol, the frank outspoken child, he displayed an affection which was remarked by all observers, and the boy would come home from one of his rides with Uncle Wolfe all aglow with a child's affection and love.

The Marquis had fair to be popular among his people too. For one thing he always had a kindly word for all who greeted him, and the women and children, who were at first rather awed by the flash of his dark eyes, and the sudden shrinking of the thick brows, soon got used to them, or forgot them, as they looked up at the handsome face and listened eagerly to the musical voice and the good-natured laugh.

Of all that was going on, and the impression the Marquis was making,

Constance heard directly through Arol or the servants of some of the village people at whose cottages the said Arol would sometimes stop in their walks to get him a glass of milk or chat with the women, who always eagerly craved a word with the "beautiful young Lord."

But on this, the sixth day, she was
