The Czar has interceded with President Carnot for the release of the Duke of Orleans, urging that the latter's escapade is pardonable indiscretion of youth. It is not likely the Czar's intercession will accomplish any result, as the Republicans already think the Duke has been treated and denounce of the press and liberty to meet in public for public purposes; free education; a normal working day; the prohibition of Sunday work and child labor; the unrestricted right of child labor; the unrestricted right of deference shown him on account of his royal blood as dangerous sentiment.

The report of Lord Hartington's commission on the army and navy will appear next week. It is severe on the War Office system, which it finds to be extravagant, cumbrous and insufficient. It dwells with emphasis upon the fact that the responsibility of all heads of bureaus is only nominal, and it proposes to abolish the position of Commander in Chief, now held by the Duke of Cambridge, and to substitute a military chief of staff, to be assisted by an Advisory Board, to whom all heads of departments shall be directly responsible. It advises that the power of granting warrants be withdrawn from the Secretary of State and be invested in Parliament. It declares that the navy is well organized - and well managed.
