

The Prelate's Hand.

A Story of the Peninsular War.

By Edward Leamy.

Doctor Brisson was the last man in the world...

I was a student then living in an office on one of the dingy streets that clustered round the Sorbonne...

You saved my life, doctor, when it was ebbing, said Jacques, and why should I offer it to you and to madame when we can turn same?

What is the matter, Jacques? I asked. It is the matter, he answered, loudly, I am ill—ill!

It is a ring, doctor, I told him. A ring? he asked, looking at me with a look of incredulity.

It is a ring, doctor, I told him. A ring? he asked, looking at me with a look of incredulity.

With her in the gardens of the Palais Royal, I was prepared to be there before the hour that I might not have long to wait...

The soft silken mass of hair so like Susette's almost took the sight from my eyes. I sprang forward to lift the woman up...

It was not the face I had seen in the convent at Saragossa. I was mad, I felt, for months after this, and they kept me in an asylum for the insane...

But another phantom haunts me on each occasion of the festival. Look! look! Do you see him there?—there!—there!

Calixtus yourself, Jacques, I replied, gently. You have excited yourself by talking too much. There is no one in the room besides yourself and myself.

What's the matter, doctor? I cried, when a current of ice seemed to run through my veins.

Look there! there! Do you not see him? he shouted. I looked towards the quarter indicated, and there, as clearly as if I had been looking at the sun, I saw the face of the dead bishop as Jacques had described him.

Do you see it? cried the doctor to me. I looked at him with a look of intense astonishment, and in many instances, as if he were looking at a man who had just died.

God, he said, he is there! he is there! Doctor Doctor, tell me what to do to get rid of it. It's driving me mad.

As an indication of the growth of the Church in the South, we give the following account of the prosperity that attended Father Lynch's efforts in Rouboque...

The following letter appeared in a recent issue of the Melbourne Argus—Six—Allow me to supplement the interesting information recently given in your columns regarding Christian missions in China...

The entire Protestant force engaged in Christian work amounts as stated in your columns, to 8,000, the success of that number is a credit to Catholic workers deserves some recognition.

The secrets of that success are given by many Protestant authorities. Dr. Newman's case, in his "Evangelisation of the Non-Christian World," Protestant missionary as a rule, has been for over half a century, ascribes it in the first place to a life of celibacy, such as is led by Catholic Missionaries.

Dr. Molnar, a Protestant, and Brit John C. Stewart, an American, are the authors of the latter work, which is a book of the highest character and devotion, upon whose career no criticism can be passed, but, he continues, "the Catholic missionaries enjoy the whole far more consideration from the public as well as from foreign powers, and the result of their work is, beyond question, much greater."

In any statement of Christian effort for the conversion of China, it is but simple justice to recognize the work of the Catholic missionaries in China. In many instances, as if he were looking at a man who had just died, he lives, for the extension of Christ's kingdom on earth.

Watermelon Rind Pickles—For good pickles this kind of the melon must be sliced. Throw off the green outside and all the soft, insides, and slice into slices or fanciful shapes as preferred. Soak the rind in salt water over night, using three tablespoonfuls of salt to a gallon of water. In the morning wash again in cold water, and put into a preserving kettle with a few grapes of vinegar of moderate strength and sugar—use three pints of sugar to two pints of vinegar. Cool in this syrup until clear. Some tastes would require only 1 lb. of salt. Let the water quantity is advised. See ginger root, stick cinnamon, cloves, spirit, and stick-mace and allspice. Put the rind in syrup but an hour before the rind is to be used. The rind must be the finest relishes that is made, and one never seems to tire of it.
