
THOUGHTS, &c.

AT a period like the present, when the principles of liberty are so generally understood, and its claims so strongly felt ; a measure which has for its object the giving of a Constitution to a distant Province of the British Empire, must necessarily be contemplated as involving the most extensive and interesting consequences. On the wisdom and sufficiency of its provisions depends the welfare of the Province. On

B the