(By Allan P. Ames)

The landlady regarded the pretty widow with some disfavor.

"I don't know," she hesitated. "We've never had a child in the house before, and I don't know what Mr. Chagrin would say."

"Mr. Chagrin?" queried little Mrs. Burlingame. "Your husband?"

"No," snapped the landlady. "But he's boarded here a long time and he's mighty pertickler."

"Oh, but he hasn't seen my baby," was the conclusive answer.

Proof of the widow's powers of persuasion was a large bribe that Arthur Chagrin accumulated from a collection of his shins with a perambulator in the dark vestibule that evening. The perambulator was the chariot of Richard Burlingame, Jr.

He did not mention the encounter, not being quite certain as to the nature of the strange vehicle over which he stumbled; but during the night little Dick Burlingame gave vocal evidence of his unfamiliar presence in the hitherto childless boarding house, and Chagrin descended to breakfast grim with determination.

But when he was introduced to Dick's mother, and after one of the pleasantest breakfast hours he could remember, he found himself on the way downtown with his protest unspoken.

A baby in the house! A travelling kid that slept all day and kept himself and everybody else awake all night. He wouldn't stir, or he wouldn't wait till morning! He couldn't afford to lose another night's rest. He would act now.

Chagrin's dressing robe about his tall form, Chagrin started down the hall, undecided whether to protest to the landlady or direct to the point of disturbance. Before he had reached a conclusion Mrs. Burlingame's door flew open. Suddenly Mrs. Burlingame, in a bewildering lacy thing and her long beautiful hair in confusion, burst upon him.

Now was his time to speak, but before his lips could frame the words—"Oh, Mr. Chagrin," she cried, "I'm glad to find you. Dicky has the crump. Here the poor baby struggle for breath. Please get me some snow. Quick!"

"Wh—what?" gasped the amazed bachelor. "Did you say snow?"

"Yes, snow," she almost shrieked. "That, or ice, is the only thing that will do any good."

Chagrin bent over the child's crib, and then went back to his bachelor suite with a glow about his shriveled bachelor heart that was more than a match for incipient pneumonia.

The next day there was a new star boarder in the house. Arthur Chagrin had often succeeded by Richard B. Burlingame, Jr., aged 15 months.

Chagrin never really understood how he found himself, clad only in pajamas and dressing gown and bath slippers, out on the sidewalk in a temperature near zero, scooping handfuls of snow from the bank in the gutter. Back he rushed and up the stairs regardless of wet feet and goose flesh.

"Oh, I thought you'd never come," was all the thanks he got, as the distracted mother plunged her hands into the feathery coldness and applied it to the quivering, panting breast of the child.

When at last the dread visitant had been vanquished and Richard B. Burlingame with one of babyhood's marvellous recoveries slumbered peacefully in dry bedclothes, she thanked Mr. Chagrin as only a young and pretty mother can thank a man who has rendered a service to her child.

"And I don't care if you do wake him," she concluded. "You may kiss him. Mr. Chagrin. You certainly deserve it."
