ciety, was in the chair and all the engineering students and several members of the faculty and a number of citizens were present.

The address, which was exceedingly interesting, instructive and replete with valuable information, occupied about an hour. The speaker first explained the methods by which engineers prepared for the preliminary survey, especially through the woods, and then took up the preliminary survey and correction of gradients and curves. The construction of culverts, bridges, ditches and filling in of swamps was dealt with. The use of piling and the selection of piles was fully described.

The lectures gave his experience on the I. O. R. and spoke of the methods employed in air spatially described.

The lectures gave his experience on the project of the various practical methods employed by railway engineers. In closing the gave the students good advice, pointing out that to be successful it was necessary for them to keep their eyes open, to be studious and industrious and attentive to their professional duties.
