Katharine's Sacrifice

It was a type of man's mean and cruel nature, the intenses satisfaction he felt in having the girl—weak, forlorn, unhappy—crushed down by the burden of a secret, bitter and awful enough to break the stoutest spirit. Katharine little knew the full passion of admiration her beauty had awskened in Gordon's breast. She had shrank, as we know, from the very whisper of such a thing; the mere suggestion of love from him sent a cold shudder from head to foot. Her unconcealed loathing and hatred all come back to him now, as he paced to and fro softly, planning the utter destruction of her fair life and reputation; came back to fan the flame of revenge still higher, and spur the steed of unprincipled desire to madness.

"Yes," he said, over and over again to himself. "Yes, that will do; nothing could be better. I don't fancy Miss Mostyn will hesitate to come to my aid. I must risk that, however, for there is no time to lose; she is coming to herself. I muit strike while the iron is hot, and then get at the gentle Barbara afterward."

Katharine's lips had parted, and a sigh

Katharine's lips had parted, and a sigh ad come from between them; her small slowly, she opened her eyes.

Gordon had thrown himself into his old attitude on a chair, and, with his arms folded, was carefully surveying her with a smile. Consciousness did not come entirely at first, but as the faintness wore off, the dazed look vanished out of her lovely orbe, and he knew, by the sudden contraction which followed this, that remembrance had flashed back to the brain once more.

A small stand of liquors and spirits was on the table, and Gordon, rising, poured out a little dose of brandy.

"Drink this!" he commanded, abruptly. "No, don't refuse. You will require all your strength, I can tell you."

In fact, her undeniable illness was lairming and provoking to him. A sick wife was not exactly what he wanted. Weakened beyond all description, Katharine found herself obeying him. She swallowed the spirit, and he left her in péace for a moment or two, then, drawing up his chair close to her side, he tent forward confidentially.

tent forward confidentially.

"I am glad we are begining to understand each other so well, Kattie," he said in that semi-affectionate, familiar tone which made her proud blood boil; "it is so much better to begin as we mean to go on, fan't it?"

Katharine pressed one hand to her throbing temples. She must get strength enough to tell this man what was in her mind.

Gordon smiled to himself, he under if it will give you any satisfaction to do so! Tastes differ! I don't consider that death holds out such tempting prospects; but then I forgot—all martyred young females talk of dying on the very smallest provocation, don't they?"

Katharine shivered again. What—what was she to do with such a nature as this to struggle against?

"Laugh away!" she said, bitterly, in tones of utter misery, "I know there is not a spark of honor, of manliness, of generosity in you to which I can appeal, but"—her voice sunk from weakness—"I do—do not mean to even speak with you again if I can help it; there are others who will help me when the truth is told, who will—"

"Are there?" Gordon interrupted with a sneer. "You think the world will treat with kindness and consideration when my story has been told?"

Katharine sanguish-laden eyes met his. "They will not believe your story," she said, feebly.

"Will they not? I must beg to differ

"Will they not? I must beg to differ from you in that. Kattie. Perhaps you think they will believe yours. Foolish child! Why, when it came to be proved, it would melt into thin air!"

Katharine drew a deep sharp breath. "You-"you forget!" she whispered. "There is always the—the old mine, and—" She could say no more."

-" She could say no more.
"The old mine? Oh, yes, of course, that remains; but what of it? There is nothing in the mine that would support that would support the say of the say Rotaing in the mine that would sup-port your accusation!"

Katharine repeated the last words to herself in a slow dazed way. She looked at him undecidedly, then gave a broken cry, and buried her face in her hands suddenly.

Was he right after all, and her brain as going? The though rushed into her was going? The though rushed into her mind.

"Absolutely nothing!" Smythe went on, suavely. "And with Craven Adair out in Australia, why, you see, my dear Kattie, your atory would be nowhere beside mine, would it?"

"Oh, what crime have I committed that my life should be darkened and cursed by you as it is now?"

The words broke fiercely from her pale lips, and Gordon frowned.

"Come." he said, roughly, "we have arrive at a good, practical understanding. You are my wife; there is no gainsaying that. You wish our marriage to be denied and kept secret, do you not?"

A momentary gleam of light in her-

A momentary gleam of light in hereys answered him.

"Very well," he observed; "now it suits my purpose to be kind to you, Kattie, much as you may be surprised at the fact, therefore I wish to tell you that I will meet you in this desire half way. Our marriage shall be secret. No. at the fact, therefore I wish to tell you that I will meet you in this desire half way. Our marriage shall be secret. No one but ourselves shall know of it. We will meet our friends as cousins while we remain under this roof together, for if either of us goes away suddenly it will be a very regrettable thing from many points of view, and you shall be as independent and free of me as you were before I came."

He paused.

Katharine, in her surprise, agitation and excitement, was leaning forward with parted lips.

"Yes, I am quite in earnest," he said, answering that look with a sneering smile. "Quite. Do you doubt me!"
She did not reply. She was almost too weak for whrds but at length a whisper broke from her lips.

"But—but have you told Miss Mos-

"I only said that to frighten you at first," he answered, promptly. "No one knows anything of this, and no one shall know! You must swear to guard our marriage secret, to divulge it to no one, until I take the seal from your lips. Be sure I sl "I say nothing; it is you who must be careful not to utter a word."

Katharine gazed at him blankly; she did not comprehend him; this sudden veering around unsettled her more than she could say.

"In fact, so earnestly do I enforce this secrecy," Gordon went on, "Kattie, that I shall add a little condition to our compact, to be fulfilled if you break it by breathing one word to any single living soul that we are man and wife. Give me your hand!"

She hesitated; at any other time she would have started up proudly and

She hesitated; at any other time she would have started up proudly and dashed past him, but to-day she was not herself in the very smallest degree; she was still ill. The brief interview with Ormande had broken her down still further, and now she was quivering and trembling with dread and loathing at the horrible thing that had come to pass, the sinister fate that had thrown her into Gordon Smythe's power.

"Give me your hand!" he said, sharply, and with that he stretched out his own strong, sinewy one and grasped hers.

"Now, hear my condition," he said in slow, even tones. "I command you to shers.

"Now, hear my condition," he said in slow, even tones. "I command you to be silent, to meet me, until such times it as I shall name, with only the natural, ease that would be between two cousins, such as we are; if—mark this clearly, Katharine—if I hear that you have spoken of our marriage, I will, without hesitation, shoot or kill Ormande, your lover, dead on the spot. You see that"—Katharine was trembling in every limb. What horrible, what awful words were these! "Do you understand me quite clearly!" asked the smooth, cruel voice of her torturer, "or shall I repeat the condition once again? You know I make no idle threats, Katte; I am not a man who fails in any purpose I wish to carry out, and so I warn you. If—I only say if—you hold this man dear, you will remember our little bond, and keep a still tongue in your head. After all, I am only serving you, my dear girl. You are not desirous of publishing the fact of our marriage to the world, nor am I; but in case you may feel a sudden desire to confide in anyone, I have thought it wise to restrict you by one little condition—a very small one, after all, you must own, Kattie, and as it fits in so well with your wishes, one that you will easily keep.

The girl litted her beautiful eyes to enough to tell this man what was in her mind.

Gordon smiled to himself; he understood her face thoroughly.

"Of course you have determined to be a sensible girl, and do everything as I wish, Kattie: haven't you?"

She shivered, and clung to the arm of the chair for protection, as it were.

"I will never link my life to yours! I will die first!" she muttered, hoarsely and quickly.

Gordon laughed outright.

"A most praiseworthy declaration. Die! Oh, by all means, my dear, die, if twill give you any satisfaction to do so! Tastes differ! I don't consider that death holds out such tempting prospects; but then I forgot—all martyred young females talk of dying on the very smallest provocation, don't they?"

Katharine shivered again. What—words came back to her.

"Kill Ormande, your lover!"
Her lover, her brave, frank, loyal, generous-hearted lover; the man who had knelt at her feet and prayed for her love, and who had studied her so much that his own sorrow at her refusal should not touch her! Kill him! It would be like shutting out the sun, robbing the earth of its fairest flower, its aweetest fragrance. Such a pure nature as Ormande's of its fairest flower, its awestest frag-rance. Such a pure nature as Ormande; was something to be guarded and trea-sured in this sordid, cruel world. Gordon had sworn to kill him, if—if she— Katharine started to her feet with a

Katharine states cry."

"No, no," she murmured, incohert ently, "you— you will not, must not, harm him! I love him! I love him! He shall not—"

Half blindly she staggered back against the table.
"Air! Air!" she breathed, wildly.
"Give me—air—"

"Give me—air—"
Gordon half led, half carried her to the open window. He could have shouted aloud with joy. The battle had been won so easily.

As he saw the faintness leave her he spoke again.

"You must go up to your room and rest ,Kattie. Remember, we have our parts to play, and there must be no breaking down. Come, rouse yourself; you are known to have been ill, so your looks will not cause any surprise if you are seen. Come; that is good, and Kattie"—just stopping her for an instant—"we understand each other, don't we, eh?"

Her eyes met his unflinchingly, and the next moment, with weak, faltering footsteps, she had crawled across to the door and he was alone.

Onion Gruel—Boil a few sliced onions in a pint of fresh milk, stirring in a little oatmeal and a pinch of salt; boil until the onions become tender and take at once.

Telegraph Manager Missing.

Berlin, Ont., Oct. 5.—Herbert Smith, local manager of the Great Northwestern Telegraph Company, it is alleged, absconded last Friday night with several hundred dollars of the company's funds. He was last seen taking the trolley for Galt. Smith is a dark, good-looking young man, with a crippled foot and walks with a decided limp. The company is offering a liberal reward for his arrest.
