Plates. A POPULAR STYLE OF SUIT FOR

What Made

New Zealand.

Just previous to 1880 the Common-wealth of New Zealand was in the depths of a serious financial depression, and the outlook was very gloomy. The country had great riches of soil and climate, and it could produce enormous numbers of sheep miles from all the great world markets, and there was no method of transporting meat, butter, and other animal products and keeping them fresh. So the enormous flocks of sheep and herds of cattle were worth but little more than their skin, bones, hides, and wool. About ten cents was all that a sheep was worth after its wool was removed, and vast numbers of cattle were converted into fertilizer, or boiled down for the fat.

Think of that in these days of the expansion of compressed air was discovered about that time and the first cargo of frozen mutton was sent from Australia in 1879. The problem of transporting perishable articles to the ends of the earth was solved. New Zealand immediately adopted the process. Now it could sell its beef, mutton, butter and cheese in London or Paris, and its exports amounted to twenty million dollars' worth of meat, and fifteen million dollars' worth of butter and cheese yearly. Financially New Zealand was saved.
