...My mother and fister—how did I sahour alternately to save them from expiring I but all my diligence would have been ineffectual had not our captain possessed a humans as well as a liberal heart. Everymoment he could spare from the important avocations of his ship, were given to my wretched relations; nor did he sail exhorting me to remember how much depended upon my health and assiduity.

My poor father, my poor mistaken sather, was committed to the deep with the most decent ceremony our circumstances could allow; and, from having exhausted our tears, we feemed for a time to have outlived our forrows i, a, fearcity of provisions was, however the next calamityannounced to our miferable companions; a calamity that we should never have selt, but from that unaccountable perverfenels which governs the species; for, so long as the name of want was unknown, we refused every superfluity of sublistence; yet the inflant we were informed, that thole superfluities could no longer be supplied, we began to lament the lofs of them; and as our minds were more and more awakened by the apprehensions of a famine, to by the natural fulpention of our grief we became more and more fentible to the demands of hunger. What extremities we might have been reduced to, it is impossible to fay, as the terrors of a ftorm foon altered our condition.

My mother, overcome by fuch compliexted diffress, called us to join with her in fome preparatory prayers to our general departure; when, in the midft of the folemn. talk, the captain broke in upon us, and bad us follow him if we wished to prolong . our existence, for that he expected the thip to firike every inflant. ' My children (said my mother, in accents that still vibrate on my ear) let me take you to my arms; may heaven behold you with that compatition it has thought fit to deny to me, and though deprived both of paternal and maternal protection, graciously fuffer the dawn of prosperity once more to bless you! We part, it is true, never more in this world to be united, but, O preserve your minds from all falle, all impious impressions of the deity! because you may conceive this a fad proof that virtue does not lead to happiness. Death, death, my children, is the great teacher on which alone you must rely if you would not fall into dangerous deceptions; he will teach you, that there are rewards beyond the. grave adequate to the most partial estimate of your unfortunate mother's merit, notwithflanding the can now only cover her head whilst the conjures you to fly from the dinolution, the is reloved to experience.

in that veffel where the unfortunately loft your father."

Need I mention the effect this speech produced on our hearts? Forgetful of our own-danger, we instinctively fell again on our knees by this parent of affection, and declared that her fate should be ours, let is he ever so dreadful.

The generous captain hegged we would permit him to be our common friend. 'I cannot desert you, said he, let what will be the confequences; and perhaps I make you no facrifice, when I refolve not to quit the thip unless you will accompany me : samine has already began its devastations, the winds and waves have us equally at their mercy, were we to change our fituation; and it is more than probable, that if we furvived the dangers of the one, we might fall a prey to the horrors of the other. I will, therefore, faid he, tell our friends our resolution : so saying, f he hastily quirted the cabin, as if fearful that so extraordinary a request as dying with us would not have been granted him.

My mother was not able to support this scene. Dispose me as you please (cried she) I can live but a sew hours longer, and it is an inexpressible affliction to me to think what tears those sew hours will cost you; but I may be wrong; we ought, perhaps, to exchange even one misery for another whilst probability remains. Call back your singular friend, and tell him, I wish to take every step that appears wises and best to his superior judgment.

My fifter revived by this concession, impariently fought to reap the benefit of : " it, but on reaching the deck, the beheld the boat already launched, and the fea in fuch a flate as to make it impossible for it to return to the fideof the thin for our accommodation. She fainted at the fight, and was conveyed down to us by our guardian angel. So foon as he perceived the was recovering, he entreated her not to regret the departure of the boat, 16 It is heavily laden (faid be) and my mind tells me will never reach any thore; at leaft (continued he) we have this advantage, we thall foon know the end of our fufferings; for if the fea was to spare, stamine would' defiroy: whild, on the contrary; our unhappy friends will feek to prolong their wretched existence by the most horrid means; and which of us could hehold the other the facrifice of hunger? We bent to heaven in thankfulness for the mercies we enjoyed, and only asked a freedy termination of our calamities.

Night now approached, and the fea made its way through numberless avenues; but notwithflanding we had the moment before waited as it were for destruction, we were
