DR. WILLIAMS' PINK PILLS FOR PALE PEOPLE
ARE NOT a Purgative Medicine. They are a BLOOD BUILDER, TONIC and RECONSTRUCTOR, as they supply in a condensed form the substances actually needed to enrich the Blood, curing all diseases coming from POOR and WATERY BLOOD, or from VITIATED HUMORS in the BLOOD, and also invigorate and BUILD UP the BLOOD and SYSTEM, when broken down by overwork, mental worry, disease, excesses and indiscretions. They have a SPECIFIC ACTION on the SEXUAL SYSTEM of both men and women, restoring LOST VIGOR and correcting all IRREGULARITIES and SUPPRESSIONS.
EVERY MAN Who finds his mental faculties dull or failing, or his physical powers flagging, should take these PILLS. They will restore his lost energies, both physical and mental.
EVERY WOMAN should take them. They cure all suppressions and irregularities, which inevitably entail sickness when neglected.
YOUNG MEN should take these PILLS. They will cure the results of youthful bad habits, and strengthen the system.
YOUNG WOMEN should take them. These PILLS will make them regular.

A DAUGHTER'S HEART.

By MRS. H. LOVETT CAMERON,

Author of "In a Grass Country," "A Lost Wife," "The Cost of a Lie," "This Wicked World," Etc.

SYNOPSIS.

Susan Meyrick, the heroine of the story, returns home from school, and meets Sir Jasper Keith, the antiquated affianced of her sister Adelaide, (age 30 years) and likes him. Keith discovers the selfishness of Adelaide's character and becomes interested in her homely sister, Susan. They go to a fox hunt, Adelaide riding Susan's hunter, Rob Roy, while Susan is put off with an old cart horse. Susan is thrown while getting over a hedge, and when she regains consciousness, Sir Kieth is bending over her. Sir Kieth takes Susan home in a carriage, when Miss Symonds, her chaperone, manifests indigation and surprise, not at Susan's accident, but that she and Sir Kieth should return from the hunt together. Sir Kieth grows tired of Adelaide whose beauty is that of a well groomed animal—does not understand himself, and Susan is full of perplexity. Adelaide is perplexed by Sir Kieth's indifference, but asks no questions. Sir Kieth and Susan discover their feelings toward each other. "What harm have I done you!" Sir Kieth goes away while Adelaide makes preparations for their marriage. Susan is excused from acting as one of the bridesmaids. Lord Kieth sends Susan a copy of Browning's Poems. Susan writes him her thanks. Miss Symonds, who has no love for Susan, detains the letter. Sir Kieth makes a flying visit to the home of the Meyricks. Adelaide being away in London for her trousseau, he interviews Susan, while Miss Symonds plays the eavesdropper. Miss Symonds takes Susan's letter addressed to Lord Keith to Mrs. Meyrick in London. Consternation. Sir Keith is interviewed by by Mrs. Meybrick. He promises never to see Susan again until he is married to Adelaide. Mrs. Arkwright proposes to Mrs. Meyrick that her son shall marry Susan in order to save him from an entanglement with with an actress. Mrs. Meyrick thinks the scheme a good one. Mrs. Meyrick tells Sir Keith that Susan encourages the attention of Arkwright. He is incredulous and finally concludes all women to be alike. Susan declines a ready-made husband.

He rose slowly from his chair and stood for a moment with his back to her facing the stage. The curtain was going up for the second act. The actors began their parts: he stared at them vacantly, saw them as through a fog, and heard their voices as though in an evil dream.

Then suddenly he turned round and bent down close to Mrs. Meyrick's ear.

You are all alike," he said, with bitter and angry vehemence, "young and old: there is not one of you who is good, or honest, or pure,—not one! Susan is no better than the rest. Tell her from me, if you like, that I have said so. Tell her that if she does this thing she is vile and contemptible in my eyes, and that I despise her!—It is you have made her do it!—you have preached down your daughter's heart! It is your work, woman,—your accursed work!"

And with that he flung himself away out of the box and out of the theatre, and they saw no more of him that night.

Mrs. Meyrick sank back into her corner. She felt dreadfully shocked and upset. Nobody had ever said such terrible things to her before; neither could she recall during the whole course of her existence any previous instance wherein such a repulsive and insulting word had ever been applied to her as "Woman!"

CHAPTER XII.

"It is impossible, mamma!"

It was perhaps the twentieth time she had said it, but it made no difference; the storm went on just the same.

Susan stood, pale and motionless, in front of her mother. Her hands were clinched upon the back of a chair; her face was thin and weary, perhaps because she had been crying a great deal at night lately; her lips were dry and parched, and her eyes had that look of pathetic pain which is seen in the eyes of an animal that is being tortured.

"It is impossible," she said, again.

"Why is it impossible? I do not see it. He is an agreeable young man, he has sufficient means to maintain a wife, and he desires to marry you. Where is the impossibility, pray? Besides, he says that you encouraged him,"

A wan smile hovered about her lips. "If he has said that, he says what he knows to be untrue. I could not have encouraged him. I never did so.'

"Give me, at any rate, some reason, Susan. There is nothing against this young man." (Oh, Adela Meyrick! how about Miss Cerise Vandeleur?") "There is no reason why you should not accept him."

"I do not love him. I hardly know him."

"Love is a matter of prohinquity. He is coming to stay here You will soon know him better. Promise me, at any rate, that you will try to like him."

"I cannot. I could never like him well enough to marry him," she answered, with the same steadfast voice and manner which had never changed since the commencement of the interview.

Mrs. Meyrick sighed impatiently. "You are enough to try the patience of a saint, Susan! What can be the reason of this obstinacy?"

"It is not obstinacy, mamma."

"What is it, then? Give me some reason, some tangible cause, for this rebellion against my wishes."

She turned her face slowly away, and looked sadly out of the window. The rain was coming straightly and steadily down outside, the grass was a pool of water, the gravel paths were rivers, the crocuses and snowdrops droped their draggled heads disconsolately into the mud of the garden-beds. It was all gray and dull and dismal, like her own life.

After a long pause the mother spoke again:

"Have you any reason at all, my dear?"

"Yes, mamma."

"Then tell it to me, Susan. Confide in me. Who is so fitting a confidante for a girl as her mother? Will you not tell me?"

She shook her head and tears of distress gathered in her eyes. "Do not ask me, mamma," she said, brokenly.

"And what if I guess it, my child?—what if I read your secret?"

She started, and a flush came into her pale face.

"You love some one else, Susan. Come is that not so?" Mrs. Meyrick smiled kindly, and took the listless fingers for a moment between her own. "See, I am right! you are blushing. Who is it that you love?"

"I can never tell you, mamma," she answered, in a low voice, drooping her face upon her breast.

"Never is a long day, Susan. A girl should not fear to own a pure and blameless affection to her own mother. Who is it, my dear?"

But Susan said nothing.

Then Mrs. Meyrick adopted a new tone: "Is it possible, Susan that you are ashamed to tell me?—that there is something disgraceful in this love which you dare not own to? Oh, my dear, the thought terrifies me! Tell me at once that it is not so!"

But still Susan uttered never a word, only her face grew red and white by turns, and she wrung her hands hard one into the other.

Mrs. Meyrick waited, fixing upon her eyes of surprise and of displeasure; then at last she spoke.

"I see," she said, coldly and angrily, "you are concealing from me a disgraceful secret!"

"Oh, no, no!" burst from the girl's white lips in a voice of anguish.

"Do not deny it, Susan. I will ask you no more. I had rather not know now what you are anxious to hide. Only now I must take a different line with you. There can be no question of choice for you any longer in the matter: you must marry Robert Arkwright, whether you like him or not. Your good name, your father's honor, are at stake. There can be no drawing back. We must cover up your past, and the sooner you are married and under the shelter of a husband's name the better."

"Mamma, mamma!" she cried, wildly, falling at her mother's feet, "you wrong me! you misjudge me! I have done no harm,—none, none! I have only been unfortunate, unhappy." She buried her face on her mother's knee, clutching the folds of her dress with her hands.

"Unfortunate! Unhappy!" repeated Mrs. Meyrick, with cold disdain. pushing away the shrinking form, the clinging hands, from her skirts. "Strange words these, indeed, upon the lips of a Miss Meyrick of Raybourne! I assure you I understand you very well, Susan,—too well, perhaps!"

Then Susan rose slowly to her feet. A great sense of injury and injustice arose within her,—a sense of the fruitlessness of her prayers, of the hopelessness of any appeal for help or mercy. Her tears, that had gushed forth freely as she sank at her mother's knee, ceased now to flow. She swept them proudly away. She flung back her head: there was dignity, and there was grace, in the small indignant figure drawn up to its full height.

"Mamma," she said, with something of nobility and something too of scorn in her voice, "you misunderstand me entirely. I am innocent assuredly of what you seem to have supposed. I am not ashamed of my love. I am proud of it,—yes, proud of it," she repeated, with a little toss of her head,—"proud that I should have loved and been loved again." Mrs. Meyrick, who knew, heard her, and marvelled. "There is nothing to be ashamed of; we loved mistakenly, and we have parted,—that is all. Because a love is hopeless, it is not disgraceful; and there is no disgrace here."

Where had she learned to speak like this? Who had taught poor despised little Susan such thoughts and such reasonings? Mrs. Meyrick looked at her wonderingly. For the first time she began to see where lay the charm that Jasper had seen in her, the fascination which had tempted him away from his beautiful and matchless Adelaide. Susan, with her glowing eyes and burning cheeks, with her scorn-curled lips and ringing words, was no longer the despised and insignificant daughter whom she had so long overlooked and ignored. There was feeling, there was passion, there was soul, in her face. No wonder she was dangerous!

Mrs. Meyrick saw it now plainly enough. For the first time in her life, the girl whom she had called ugly and unattractive became revealed to her as she was, and she saw in her a possible rival, and no mean one either, to the beautiful pink-and-white doll who had always been her ideal of all that was perfect in womanly loveliness.

Adelaide, for certain, could not have spoken, could not have looked like this!

But the very realization of it did but harden the mother's heart against the daughter who was strong enough to rebel against her. She felt that Susan might very likely remain firm, and that she herself would be the one to be worsted in the encounter between them. The contemptation of this possibility angered her. The thought that the whole of this charmingly-planned scheme for disposing of Susan's future would be frustrated and brought to naught simply and solely because Susan herself objected, from highflown and sentimental reasons, to be disposed of, enraged and exasperated her mother. She had intended to spare her, to deal kindly and tenderly by her, to keep silence upon that which she knew; but now she was too angry to keep silence any longer, and in her blind fury she struck at her child with that cruel weapon which she had been keeping in reserve to use against her if the worst came to the worst.

"Susan," she said, with pitiless deliberation, "I am astonished to hear that you do not consider your conduct disgraceful! There must indeed be some moral obliquity in the mind of a girl who can allow herself to fall in love with the man who is on the eve of marrying her own sister, and see no harm in it!"

The girl staggered as though under a physical blow, clutching at the table beside her to keep herself from falling.

"You know——," she faltered.

"Yes, my dear, I do know. I had intended to spare you the humiliation of words between us on such a subject, but, since you defy me, I see that kindness and consideration must be laid aside. I tell you now plainly that I know your shameful secret.

Ah! how did you know? she gasped.

"Because Sir Jasper Keith told me."

The room seemed to go round; there came a dimness before her eyes, a horrible faintness.

"He told you!" she repeated, in a horror-struck, voiceless whisper.

He not only told me, but he has given me a message for you."

"Yes," she panted eagerly.

"An unkind message, I think. I did not mean to repeat it to you, but perhaps it will be salutary for you to hear it, so that you may see what sort of opinion men have of girls who forget their womanhood and their modesty, to fling themselves at their heads."

"Go on." Her voice was hoarse and broken. A darkness, like that of a cloud swept over her face; but courage had returned to her. Something in her eyes frightened Mrs. Meyrick a little: she did not quite like to meet them; they made her feel uneasy. Still, she would not give it up: she was determined, in spite of everything, to press the poisoned arrow home to her child's heart. Thus, and thus only, she believed, could she be broken upon the wheel. She gave a little nervous laugh. "Of course he was very angry; he felt, no doubt poor fellow, that his position with Adelaide might be shaken by your imprudence and folly, and so he spoke rather hotly. It was not, perhaps, very polite, but men do not mince over their words when they are angry, and so he said that I was to tell you, from him, what your opinion of your conduct was: he says that it was vile and contemptible, and that he despises you.

After all when she had spoken the wicked and lying words, she was half sorry she had said them.

There was a dead silence. Susan neither wept nor cried out; she only stood there opposite to her, motionless and as pale as death, with her eyes fastened upon her mother's face. The look in them was so strange, so bitter, so unutterably tragic, that Mrs. Meyrick's heart began to fail her, and she turned away.

"Come, don't look at me like that, Susan! Why, you look as if you would like to murder me!" Then as there came not the ghost of an answer, she gave a little short laugh. "It was not polite, of course, of him, and I scolded him for saying it, but it will just shew you what men do say of women who forget themselves. Your best plan, Susan, will be to do as I tell you, and to marry Robert Arkwright; in fact, it is your only plan, if you want to retrieve your unlucky mistake and silence Jasper Keith's tongue. Be sensible, my dear, and do as I tell you. I assure you that I am advising you for your own good."

Then Susan spoke at last. With a swift gesture she reached out her hand and laid it upon her mother's arm. Her eyes were wild, her voice was strange and rough:

You have said a wicked thing to me. You have spoken words to me which have spoilt my life. If he said so, and if he loved me, you would have died rather than tell me. Those words have destroyed my faith, my belief in all that is good. There is no good left for me,—not anywhere. The world is filled with devils. God is no where for me. You have wrecked my soul!"

„Susan, you talk like a mad woman!"

Yes, perhaps I am mad; if I am, it is you that have made me so. Never forget that: it is you. But if you think that you will make me do as you wish, because you have repeated those awful and cruel words to me, you are mistaken I shall not marry Robert Arkwright. I may be vile, but I am not so vile as that. Tell that to Jasper Keith from me—if you can, and if you dare."

Then, without another word, she turned and left the room.

NOTICE.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Traders, Manufacturers and owners of Weights, Measures and Weighing Machines generally are specially requested to read carefully the following instructions and act accordingly:

1. The Weights and Measures Act provides for a regular biennial inspection of all Weights and Measures used for trade purposes, as well as for irregular inspections of the same, which may be made at any time when deemed necessary by the inspector, and it also imposes a heavy penalty on any trader or other person who wilfully obstructs or impedes an inspector or assistant inspector in the performance of his duty under said Act, or who refuses to produce the whole of his weights and measures for inspection when called upon to do so by an inspecting officer.

2. Every trader, manufacturer and owner of weights, measures, and weighing machines when paying moneys to Inspectors or Assistant Inspectors of Weights and Measures for verification fees, is entitled to, and is specially requested to demand from the officer who makes the inspection, an official certificate ("Form O, 6" with the words "Original for the Trader" printed at the head thereof) properly filled out and stamped, and also at the same time to carefully ascertain whether or not the stamps attached to such certificate represent exactly the value the amount of cash paid. Traders are requested to bear in mind that certificates of verification are of no value whatever unless stamps covering the full amount of fees charged are attached.

3. Owners and holders of these official certificates are specially requested to keep them carefully for two years, and in order to secure their safe keeping it would be advisable to placard them in their places of business in the manner in which ordinary license certificates are done, for it must be distinctly understood that all traders who are unable to produce their properly stamped certificates, when asked to do so by an inspector or assistant inspector, may, in all probability, have to pay over again their verification fees.
