MOONDYNE.

THE GOLD MINE OF THE VASSE.

At home! He passed through the little station house, where the old porter stared at his strange face and strange clothes, and wondered why he did not ask the way to the village. On he strode in the moonlight, glancing at familiar things with every step; for tre years had brought little change to the quiet place. There were the lone trees by the roadsides and the turnpike, and down in the hollow he saw the moon's face reflected through the ice in the millpond; and seeing this, he stopped and looked, but not with the outward eye, and he saw the merry skaters, and Alice's head was on his shoulder, and her dear voice in his ear, and all the happy love of his boy hood flooded his heart, as he bowed his face in his hands and sobbed.

Down the main street of the village he walked, glancing at the bright windows of the cottage homes, that looked like smiles on well-known faces. He passed the post office, the church, and the inn; and a few steps more brought him to the corner of his own little street.

corner of his own little street.

The windows of the Draper's house were lighted, as if for a feast or merry-making within; but he passed on rapidly, and stopped before the garden gate of the widow's cottage. There, all was dark and silent. He glanced through the trees at his own old home, which lay beyond, and saw a light from the kitchen, and the moonlight shining on the window of his own room.

But here, where he longed for the light.

But here, where he longed for the light, there was no light. He laid his hand on there was no light. He laid his hand on the gate, and it swung open before him, for the latch was gone. He passed through, and saw that the garden-path was rank with frozen weeds, and the garden was itself a wilderness. He walked on and stood in the porch, and found a bank of snow against the bottom of the cottage door, which the wind had whirled in there, perhaps a week be fore. He stood in the cheerless place for a moment, looking into his heart, that was as empty as the cottage porch, and as as empty as the cottage porch, and as cold; and then he turned and walked coid; and then he turned and walker down the straight path, with almost the same feeling that had crushed him so crueltly eleven years before.

He passed on to his own home, which had been shut out from his heart by the cloud that covered his way; and a feeling of reproach came upon him, for his ing of reproach came upon him, for his long neglect of those who loved him. Those who loved him! There was a something warming in his heart, and rising against the numbness that had stilled it in the cottage porch. He stood before the door of his old home, and knocked twice.

The door opened, and a strange face to William Sheridan met his look. Choking back a something in his throat, he said, with an effort:—

"Is this Mrs. Sheridan's house?"

"It was Mrs. Sheridan's house, sir," answered the man; "but it is my house now. Mrs. Sheridan is dead." Another cord snapped, and the stranger in his own place turned from the door with a moan in his heart. As he turned, a young woman came from within to the porch; and the man, with a sudden exclamation, stepped after him, and placing his hand on his der, said earnestly, "Be this William Sheridan, that we thought were dead?" and looking in his face and re. cognizing him, he muttered, "Poor lad! poor lad! dont'ee know thy old schoolnate, Tom Bates, and thy own sister

Taking him by the arm, the kind fellow led Sheridan to the door, and said:—
"Wife, here be thy brother Will, safe and sound, and not drowned, as Sam Draper told us he were—and d—n that same Draper for all his evil doin's!"

Then William Sheridan felt his kind sister's arms on his neck, and the asso-ciations of his youth thronged up like old friends to meet him, and with them came the sweet spirit of his boy's love for Alice. They came to his heart like stormers to a city's gate, and, seeing the stormers to a city's gate, and, seeing the breach, they entered in, and took pos-session. For the second time that night, the strong man bowed his head, and sobbed not for a moment as before, but long and bitterly, for the suppressed feelings were finding a vent at last; the bitterness of his sorrow, so long and closely shut in, was flowing freely. Brother and sister were alone during this scene; but after a while, Mary's kind-hearted husband entered, a rugged but tender-hearted Lancashire farmer: and knowing that much was to be said to Will, and that this was the best time to will, and that this was the best time to say it, he began at once; but he knew, and Will Sheridan knew, that he began at the farthest point he could from what he would have to say before the end. Will Sheridan's face was turned in the shadow, where neither his sister nor her husband could see it, and so he listened to the story.

It was in a bank in a Nebraska town. A farmer slapped down $80 on the counter, and proudly remarked, "There's the last dollar I owe on my farm, and I am now entitled to a deed," "You must feel good," observed a Boston man who was in the bank on business. "I do," "And goul will now go ahead with better spirit?" "I will now take the deed, and go over to the loss office, and mortgage the old land for whis! I can, and skip," was the feeling reply,

A good story comes from a boys' boarding-school in "Jersey." The diet was monot-onous and constipating, and the learned trincipal decided to introduce some old-styl-
