For a moment more her father fidgeted about, moving his papers backward and forward, but saying nothing.

At last he spoke. "You have taken a most serious and painful step, Ida," he said. "Of course you have a right to do as you please; you are of full age, and I cannot expect you will consider me or your family in your matrimonial engagements, but at the same time I think that it is my duty to point out to you what it is that you are doing. You are refusing one of the finest matches in England in order to marry a broken-down, middle-age, half-pay colonel, a man who can hardly support you, whose part in life is played, or who is apparently a fine standard to trust herself to speak.

Somebody's baby was laid out to rest. White as a snowdrop and fair to behold, and the soft little hands were crossed over the breast.

And the hands and the lips and the cyclids were pressed with kisses as hot as the cyclids were clossd.

"Love! Pshaw!" said her father. "Don't talk to me in that sentimental and school-girl way—you are too oldfor it. I am a plain man, and I believe in family affection and in duty, Ida. Love, as you call it, is only too often another word for self will and selfishness, and other things that we are better without." nebody's sorrow is making me weep, now not her name, but I echo her cry the dearly bought baby she longed so to The baby that rode to its long lasting sleep In the little white hearse that went rumbling

"I can understand, father," answered this jobation, "that my refusal to marry Mr. Cossey, is disagreeable to you for obvious reasons, though it is not so every long ago that you detested him yourself. But I do not see why an honest woman's affections for another man should be talked of as though there was something shameful about it. It as all very well to sneer at love, but after all a woman is flesh and blood, she is not a chattel or a slave girl, and marriage is not like anything else—it means, as you must know, many things to a woman. There is no magic about marriage to make that which is unrighteous righteous, or that which is impure pure."

"I can understand, father," answered

A pang of pity shot through her heart. Edward Cossey, feeble, dejected and limping from the jaws of death, was a very different being to Edward Cossey in the full bloom of his youth and health and strength. Indeed, so much did his condition appeal to her sympathies, that for the first time aince her mental attitude toward him had been one of entire indifference, she looked on him without repugnance.

"Yes," said Ida.

"Very well, then, I come to tell you both that I am ready to find the money to meet those mortgages and pay them off."

"Ah," said the Squire.

"Also, that I am ready to do what I offered to do before, and which, as myfather is now dead, I am perfectly in a position to do—namely, to settle £200,000 absolutely upon Ida, and, indeed, generally to do anything else that she or you may wish," and he looked at the Squire.

"It is no use looking at me for an answer," said he, with some irritation. "I have no voice in the matter."

He turned to Ida, who put her hand before her face and shook her head.

"Parkara," said Parkara," and the selection many settled in high esteem.

"I have thought, Mr. Cossey," answered Ida, almost passionately, "I have thought until I am tired of thinking, and I do not consider that it is fair that you should press me like this, especially before my father."

"Then," he said, rising with difficulty, "I have said all I have to say, and done all that I can do. I shall still hope that you may change your mind; I shall not abandon hope. Good-by."

She touched his hand and then the Squire offering him his arm, he went down the steps to his carriage.

"I hope, Mr. de la Molle," he said, that bad as things are for me, if they should take a turn, I shall have your support?"

"My dear, sir," answered the Squire, "I tell you frankly that I wish my daughter would marry you. As I said before, it would for obvious reasons be desirable. But Ida is not like ordinary women. When she sets her mind upon a thing she sets it like a flint. Things may change, however, and that is all I can say. Yes, if I were you, I should remember that this is a changeable world and that women are the most changeable things in it."

When the carriage had gone he re-entered the vestibule. Ida, who was going away much disturbed in mind, saw him coming and knew by the expression of his face that there was going to be trouble. With characteristic courage she turned, determined to brave it out.

State inside of the next ten days. A hail storm on the 24th did some damage to the oats in Ionia county.

Darwin J. McKay, the Barry county convict under a life sentence for murder, whose case has excited widespread interest, was granted an unconditional pardon by Governor Luce on Thursday. The Governor gives strong reasons for extending executive clemency, concluding as follows: "I have hesitated over the case because of the enormity of the crime. A murder was committed; an old man of 78 years was stricken down cowardly, and his head beaten with an axe until he was dead. The murderer ought to be punished to the extent of the law, and if guilty, the convict ought not to be discharged. But believing that McKay is innocent, and that he did not commit the murder, I cannot in a discharge of the important duty imposed upon the Governor detain him longer. The Board of Pardons have filed a voluminous report that I think would go far towards convincing the unprejudiced that the cenclusion reached is but a simple act of justice."

Meanwhile her father had shaken him by the hand, and led him to an armchair before the fire.

Then after a few questions and answers as to his accident and merciful recovery, there came a pause.

At length he broke it. "I have come to see you both," he said, with a faint nervous smile, "about the letters you wrote me. If my condition would have allowed it I would have come before, but it would not."

"Yes," said the Souire attentively, while laft folded her hand in her lap and sat still with her eyes fixed upon the fire.

"It seems," he went on, "that the old proverb has applied to my case as to so many others—being absent, I have suffered. I understand from these letters that my engagement to you, Ida, is broken off."

She made a motion of assent.

"And that it is to be broken of on the ground that, having heen forced by a combination of circumstances which I cannot enter into, to transfer the mortgages to Mr. Quest, consequently, I broke my bargain with you?"

"Yes," said Ida.
