Grip's Political Economy---Too Cheap and Easy by Far. Professor Grip gave the public rather an excessive dose of his kind of political economy last week. We should say there was entirely too much Free Trade in it to suit the average man, let alone the average Canadian, who we fancy is constitutionally inclined the other way. Grip observes that a large and influential deputation has recently waited on Hon. Mr. Mowat in support of a bonus of a million dollars asked for by the great dry goods and clothing establishment of Steb-bins. McGorlick & Co. Which delicate bit of pleasantry is intended to convey to us a sense of how absurd it is for Government to help any kind of private enterprize, either by means of Protection or otherwise. Yet it remains nonthe less true that England's Indian Empire was built up in great measure through Gov rference of a kind very much ettle and put aside as done for with a bit of Grip will have Mr. Mowat appear in this ess, we are reminded of something and which would not have happened at al had the Premier of Ontario said "no." Tha was when Mr. Mowat, through legislation which he controlled, handed over to the Grand Trunk, practically free by Toronto and other municipalities to the Nipissing, the Midland, and other local railways. On that occasion Mr. Mowat's legislation practically gave to certain "bloaked bondholders" in England the control of a large amount of money and money's worth, which had been subscribed by Canadian tax-payers, for the express purpose of obtaining certain local, independent railways, which after all were diddled away from them before their eyes. The imaginary case of Steb-bins, McGorlick & Co. does not look a great

Grip further represents the Canadian tax-payer as having an aching tooth, and as wanting something better than jokes about it from his political dentist—Dr. John A. represented as "groaning his heart out unde and exclusive benefit of a few favoured man-facturers." Now, is this a fair picture, or anything like it—of the present situation in Canada? It is rather a ridiclous caricature, a running of the thing into the ground, which is so ridiculous that it cannot do much good

Grip is in truth a Grit extremist; we may say he is like the handle of a jug—all on one side. Sir Leonard Tilley was never counted a man of jokes; but he certainly got off one with the sting of truth in it when he said that the name should be changed to Grit to make it right. According to Grip, or Grit, the sting of truth in it when he said that the name should be changed to Grit to make it right. Ever since the new year, business at the play-houses has been quite slim; it was slim last night. With the advent of cold weather, however, a better state of affairs is looked for. but a glance at the well-known names for old theatre-goers to decide at once that it was a finished performance. The piece in itself is most amusing. The plot turns upon the financial straits and make-shifts of upon the financial straits and make-shifts of a young couple who have married without the consent of the girl's rich father. He is a dramatic author given to tragedy, but can never get his plays produced. She surreptitiously writes a comedy, which she sends to a manager in his name. It is accepted with avidity, and produced with great success, and so all ends happily, the father forgiving the couple, though he had been made the study for one of the parts in the comedy.

made the study for one of the parts in the comedy.

In the meantime, however, the couple had been put to a great many shifts from lack of money, and the most amusing scene was when the furniture of the young couple was carted off by the dealer who had sold it on the instalment plan and never received his pay. By an ingenious arrangement of such articles as were at hand—a few baskets, some soap boxes, an ironing board, a flour barrel, etc.—Margery and Bella (that princess of sour brettes, Alice Harrison) contrived to furnish the dining-room, being aided in draping these articles with shawls, window curtains and similar houshold effects, and the funof this was greatly heightened when an angry creditor—the father, who had bought up the bills against them—threatened to seize the furniture to satisfy the debt. A sub-plot runs through the piece, and altogether it is a most delicious farce comedy, bristling with wit and humor. The company, as has been intimated, is first-class.

"Our Flat" will be continued during the week, and des rives extended patronage, with matiness on Wednesday and Saturday. A plan of the house will be kept at Nordheimers', where seats may be reserved.

As further testimony to this effect there is the letter dated from Versailles, Jan. 15, letter dated from Versailles, Jan. 15, 1780, which the ill-fated Marie Antoinette wrote to her mother, Maria-Theresa of Austria. "The weather here is cold and foul," writes the Queen of France, "and the dreadful fogs have caused an influenza epidemic. All Paris and Versailles, are coughing, and I have been three days in bed with the disorder. Only the King and Monsieur have escaped."

The Assize Court was crowded yesterday principally by denizens of St. John's Ward when Louis Deas, a well-known colored man was placed on trial for the murder of Michael who are nowfleeing from the wrath to come. Their only hope of suppressing the investigation, so the story runs, was to implicate a member of the prince's family in their misdeds, and thus bring the great influence of the prince to bear upon the side of silence and oblivion. It so happens, however, that the prince's belief in his son's innocence is stronger than his natural repugnance to the publicity which further ventilation of the affair must entail, and the outlook is bad for the accused aristocrats, whatever it may be for young Prince Albert Victor.
