their way back to Acadra, where arreful peace they remained unmolested, and with those who had escaped seizure, became the progenitors of the present Acadians, now settled in various parts of the British maritime provinces, notably at Madawaska, on the upper St. John, and at Claire, in Nova Scotia. Others were sent from Virginia to England, and others again, after the complete conquest of the country, found relege in France.

In one particular the authorities of the deportation were disappointed in its results. They had hoped to substitute a loyal population for a disaffected one, but they failed to flud settlers for the vacated lands. The Massachusetts soldiers to whom they were offered, would not stay in the province, and it was not tilfing years later that families of British stock began to occupy the waste fields of the Acadians. This goes far to show that a longing to become their heirs had not as here alleged, any considerablo parting in the motives for their removal.

New England humanitarianism, melting into sentimentality at a tale of woo, has been unjust to its own. Whatever judgment may be passed on the cruel measure of wholesale expatriation, it was not put in execution till every resource of patience and persuasion had been tried and failed. The agents of the French court, vivil, military, and ecclesiastical, had some act of force a necessity. The government of Louis XV. began with making the Acadians its tools and ended with making the Acadians its tools and ended with making them its victims.

Proctor says that the earth's age is placed at some 500.000,000 years, and still others of later time, among whom is the Duke of Argyll, place it at 100,000,000 years. None place it lower than 10,000,000 years, knowing what than 10,000,000 years, knowing what processes have been gone through, the earth must have become old. The makers connended that it contained a certain alkaloid which gave it valuable properties. They declared that this could not be discovered by analysis. This proved to be so far correct that many people were inclined to regard the "alkaloid" as a myth. Several lawsuits have heen waged over chlorodyne. The provincials were annoyed at the burden imposed apon them, and though the Acadians were not in general ill-treated, their lot was a hard one. Still more so was that of those who escaped to Canada. Some of them, who had made their way to Canada from Boston, whither they had been transported, sent word to a gantleman of that place, that they wished to return. Bougainville, aide de camp to Montealm, says concerning them: They are dying by hundreds. Their past and present misery, joined to the rapacity of the Canadians, who seek only to squeeze out of them all the money they can, and then refuse them the help so dearly bought, are the cause of this mortality."
