"Phwhat are ye going to take now!" queried the cook, as she mopped her face with a musk-laden handkerchief.

To meet Mr. Phamous Historian.

He went because he had a courteous habit, according to family tradition, of not declining invitations without reason, and because, in the simplicity of his young heart, he hoped to corner Mr. Phamous Historian and ask his opinion on the subject of King Cophetua. That opinion he never heard, for in an alcove of roses, under pink and brilliant Chinese lanterns, dispensing nectar from a samovar, sat a glorified vision of the lost Helen! Not for a moment did he suspect their identity. Miss Rush's nearest friends were often dazzled by her beauty in evening dress. But while his loyal soul wavered a moment, a living, lovely Helen in his own set had heavy odds against a lost housemaid. "Oh, that is Miss Rush," his hostess said, "young Mrs. Worthington Price's sister."

"Oh, that is Miss Rush," his hostess said, "young Mrs. Worthington Price's sister. She's more clever than the beauty. Some think she is as handsome," which Penny quite believed.

"It isn't very usual that I kiss a mous."

"It isn't very usual that I kiss a mous."

On the day when Worthington Price fatuously alluded to "the day you came home from Bryn-Mawr, Helen, escorted by the cook," Penny's mind was made up.

Mr. and Mrs. Price benevolently went driving after dinner, and Helen sat down on the vine-covered porch.

Though Penny's mind was made up, there was no immediate manifestation of the fact.

Helen, somewhat, tremplants as a recet.

The moonlight trickled through the arches of the wide low porch. A bat rushed with a little thub against the wall and out again. The little oat listened. The scratch of wheels on the gravel. Mrs. Price's pretty penetrating laugh.

Penny made a mighty effort. "Are you still looking for a place?"

And Helen said "Oh Penny!" and thus accepted a permanent situation.
