

They are extremely vindictive, of which I shall give you one example. Monf. Daunay, a French captain, with a servant, being overfet in a canoe, within fight of fome favages, they threw themselves into the water to fave them, and the fervant was actually faved. But the favage, who had pitched upon Monf. Daunay, seeing who it was, and remembering fome blows with a cane he had a few days before received from him, took care to fouse him fo often in the water, that he drowned him before he got afhore.

It is remarked, that in proportion as the Europeans have fettled in this country, the number of the favages confiderably diminishes. As they live chiefly upon their hunting, the woods that are destroyed to cultivate the country, must in courfe contract the diftrict of their chace, and caufe a famine amongst them, that must be fatal to them, or compel them to retire to other countries. The Englifh, fenfible of this effect, and who feemed to place their policy
