Owing to the increasing demand for and higher price of copper, which is due in great part to the extensive use of this metal in electrical appliances. Newfoundland copper deposits have attracted great attention of late. Even at present, the ancient colony is said to be the sixth largest copper-producing country in the world. The indications are that this demand will continue to grow with the spread of electrical development, a consideration which is cheering to the Newfoundlanders. The Harris Sulphur and Copper Company of Glasgow, Scotland, realizing this fact, has secured options on several mines in Newfoundland, which were secured by an expert sent out to examine them. These properties include the Colchester, Robert's Arm and Sunday Cove mines, all situated on North Dams Bay, as well as a lease of the Silver Cliff mine on Placentia Bay.
