ENGINEER SAYS THAT

HOLLAND IS SINKING

Dutch, Though, Will go on With the Making of New Land—Drain the Zuyder Zee

London, March 27.—M. Blampot test case, writing in the Engineer, suggests that Holland is slowly sinking. His theory is based partly upon the subsidence of old Roman buildings.

Such apparent subsidence is known in other countries, but in these cases it is probable that, instead of the buildings sinking, the surrounding or superposed soil has risen. The old Roman street that runs through London is now eighteen feet below Chertsey. At Aosta, in North-West Italy, the Roman pavement of the Via Praetoria is from eight to ten feet below the present level of the ground. The Cathedral of Notre Dame in Paris was formerly approached by a flight of steps, which have now disappeared. With regard to Holland, M. ten Cate says:

"A certain number of Roman edifices, the entrance to which must necessarily have been from the level of the ground when they were built in the first, second or third century, B. C., are now as high as high tide. An examination of the foundations shows that they have sunk from five to thirteen feet."

"In certain low-lying plains of Holland that have been drained for long years the level of the ground has fallen a little over a foot in two centuries."

"Finally, the formation of the Zuyder Zee and of the Gulf of Jade, in Northern Germany, leaves no room for doubt as to the subsidence of the soil in that part of Europe in fairly recent times."

But in spite of this gradual sinking of the soil of Holland, the construction of the great works for the drying of the Zuyder Zee will not be allowed to cease. The Zuyder Zee covers 700 square miles. It is estimated that the construction of a dam across the mouth would cost $18,750,000, and the process of draining another $65,000,000.
