Mr. Adams said he wouldn't consent to this, but would test the House on it. Mr. Hanington said no breach of priviege had arisen, as the Upper House could act as it liked in the matter. Its act in his case was only a question of taste. The Secretary said it was no use to send the bill to the Upper House again, unless it threw it out before under a misapprehension of facts.

Mr. Hibbard argued for the free choic of the people, and said it was time those Which MUST BE SOLD before regular Spring old class barriers were removed. Mr. King said he had always voted for the principle of the bill, but unless it was a breach of privilege to throw it out of the Inner House, he could not vote to the Upper House, he could not rote to send it there again. The question of privilege is of more consequence than any one bill. The Lower House has entire jurisdiction over its own members, M. C. BARBOUR, their return, etc , but it has not exclusive jurisdiction over the qualification of electors. It has no exclusive jurisdiction over the eligibility of a candidate.
