And in bringing this report to a close we feel it most fitting that a slight reference should be made to the part played by the Red Cross on Armistice Day. In the procession of November 12th, in the city of St. John, the Red Cross had its float beautifully draped in white with its emblem emblazoned on the sides, and overhead the banner under which so many have faithfully worked during the years of war, showing that, while it had sorrowed with those whose sufferings had been great, so did it rejoice that hostilities had ceased. A promise too for any work yet to come.

New Brunswick sent its quota of doctors and nurses, many of whom were decorated for their bravery and devotion to duty, and of every one she is justly proud.

And to those who perforce had to remain at home, the Red Cross will ever be the significant emblem of the opportunity which enabled them to pour forth in loving service the affection they held for the individual soldier, into the broader stream of love for that humanity which the Red Cross has served too well. Each many feel that they had their share in a work which made it possible for many men of all ranks, from the highest to the lowest and in every department of army life, to say sincerely and with the deepest meaning:

“God Bless the Red Cross.”
