DARSONS' PURGATIVE PILLS make New Rich

THE SIGNOR AMERICAN.

I.

It was in the baptistery at Pisa that Berry first saw her. He had Just entered the door as she fittered a few clear soprano notes, and in moment was awakened that peculiar echo that once heard is never for, got—a seeming multitude of voices in unearthly tender sweetness taking up the strain and watting it to the highest heavens.

S.

Berry bowed his thanks in recognition of the treat in which he had shared. She glanced uneasily to ward her escort, a middle-aged gentleman, with bald, shining head and long gray whiskers, slightly inclined her head in return and spoke two or three words—at least Berry saw her lips move though he did catch the words.

The custode of the bapistery, moved with jealousy of being outdone, must just then show what he could do by throwing down upon the marble floor a block of wood, and the blow awakened the most deafening and howling crash upon crash-right royally, I promise you.

The custode with his block of wood never knew that he lost three francs for his pains. The five francs that Berry would have gladly given in his happiness was but a begrudged franc in his resentment. However, he relented to the amount of another franc when the stupid old man said, as he placed the fee carefully away in his pocket with one hand and motioned toward the vanishing car-riage of the visitors with the other, "Ah! she did sing from her heart— the madonus-faced."

the madonna-faced! Doubtless the expression was one that he of the baptistery would have gladly bestowed on any fair five-franc donor, even on Miss Miggs herself; though in this case he had been moved by the power of beauty as well as by a lively admiration for a cheerful when the was hungry and had just growled at the delay of dinner. When Giulio quietly appeared on the opposite side of the court, arrayed in his spotless apron, and was about to call 'Dinner is served, sir,' he was struck dumb by Berry's pantomimic demands for his silence. The voice ceased a moment, and was beginning a second aria, when the power of beauty as well as by a lively admiration for a cheerful giver. She might well have stepped out of some old worshipped canvas, that rare, golden haired daughter of that rare, golden haired daughter of bewhiskered count sounding upon the glared up to the sounding upon th

Molina could or would only shrug his shoulders, and turning his hands belplessly outward, as if beseeching mergy, edged away toward the hotel entrance. Berry paused a moment even then irresolute to accept the situation, and hearing some light steps behind him, turned and saw the sweet singer of the baptistery, the sweet singer of the baptistery, the sweet singer of the baptistery, which be replaced on the table without uttering a word, and began nervously shifting some of the dishes.

Will have it that nothing is half good enough for the Signor American.

Molina was out of the room changing the courses when Giulio, in great trepidation, returned, bearing the flowers, which he replaced on the table without uttering a word, and began nervously shifting some of the dishes.
