A Woodstock Divorce Case
Reveals Chicken Stew Party
When Everybody Got Stewed

Mrs. Violet E. Faulkner's Case for Divorce From Howard H. Faulkner Heard Before Mr. Justice Crockett Yesterday Afternoon—Plaintiff Makes Good Impression

In the New Brunswick Divorce Court yesterday afternoon the case of McKay vs. McKay, the remnant from the July sitting which was taken up yesterday morning, was concluded when Dr. D. W. Ross, of this city, was called to the stand to testify that he attended the defendant during her confinement when she gave birth to a child which the plaintiff claims was not his child. Court considers.

The rest of the afternoon session of the court was taken up hearing the case of Violet E. Faulkner vs. Howard H. Faulkner, also a remnant from the July sitting of the court, which was undefended. R. L. Simms appeared for the plaintiff and W. L. Tibbitts, Alfred Bagley, James Long and Mrs. Bert Sewell, all of Woodstock, were called as witnesses. Deputy Provincial Secretary Tibbitts was the first witness called, and he was followed by the plaintiff herself, a delicate little woman, who told her story not without sob and easily won her way into the hearts of the spectators.

She stated that she and the defendant in the case were married by Rev. W. C. Kelstead at Woodstock on Jan. 17, 1908, and had lived happily together until 1912, when the defendant developed the habit of coming home drunk early in the morning and sometimes absenting himself from the company of his family for several days. She stated that he often used abusive language to her and at times had been so drunk that he had to be helped to his room. She named Mabel Peppers, of Woodstock, as co-respondent, and stated that because her husband neglected her and his family she had complained to Chief of Police Kelly of Woodstock and that the defendant in the action for divorce had been locked up in jail for a week on the charge of non-support. While he was in the Police Station she had been assisted with food and clothing by the town authorities.

To Judge Crockett she stated that after her husband left she had found homes for her six children and had found a position on a farm outside of Woodstock where she had been able to help support her children and at the same time put some money by for the divorce action. She stated that her husband had been brought up by his stepfather as a meat cutter and had lived first at Hamilton, Me., and later at Woodstock.

The Chicken Stew Party. Alfred Bagley, machinist, of Woodstock, was the next witness called. He stated that he knew the defendant well, and that while he was not a "worthless bum" at all times he was considered such when under the influence of liquor. He stated that on the night of the general election in 1912 the defendant's father, Joseph Faulkner, had invited a party of three to go to his home, about five miles out of Woodstock, for a "chicken stew," stating that he would make the stew. The party got about one-half mile from Woodstock when the team in which they were travelling was stopped and a woman known as Mabel Peppers was added to the "stew" party. In the party there were a young fellow named Hull, who the witness stated, had died two years ago from pneumonia, the defendant, Mabel Peppers, the witness and Joseph Faulkner, also now deceased. He stated that the party had all been drinking and retired about 2 a. m., when he and Hull slept together. He stated that the defendant was lying on a couch in a room off the kitchen with the Peppers woman, when he (the witness) and Hull retired.

Asked by Mr. Justice Crockett if they were drinking at the time, he said they were not, as all the liquid refreshments had been absorbed by that time. Asked if he saw the two carrying on improper relations with each other, he said no; and when questioned by Mr. Simms he stated that he had heard snatches of conversation which Joseph Faulkner, the grandfather, had had with the grandson (the defendant), and which he repeated.

Judge Crockett commented that "it was a nice kind of a grandfather to have."

The witness stated that when he came downstairs in the morning he had called to the defendant, who was lying awake on the couch with the Peppers woman, telling him that it was time to get up.

Dropped in Stayed All Next Day. James Long of Woodstock, who stated that he had worked as a machinist as well as in a drug store, was then called as a witness. He stated that he had seen the defendant and the Peppers woman in bed at the home of his mother in Woodstock, about four years ago. He stated that his mother had been away at the time—he thought that she had come to this city—and that while she was away Faulkner had knocked at the door and asked if he and the Peppers woman could come in and get warm. The witness told them they could and after they had got warmed up he suggested that they should go up to bed, which they did.

When questioned by Judge Crockett, the witness stated that the two had slept together and had stayed at his mother's house during the next day, when he furnished the meals for them. They left the house some time during the next evening. Witness himself stated he had not been working that day and this led to a series of questions by Judge Crockett which showed that the witness was a married man but that his wife and himself had not lived together for upwards of nine years. He did not know where she was at the present time.

Mrs. Bert Sewell was the next witness called and she made further statements to support those of the plaintiff that the defendant had "used her cruelly, stating that one time "when Howard was torturing Violet, my husband was called in to interfere."

Judge Crockett stated that he would consider the matter, as both Long and Bagley seemed mixed up in the case, the latter being a party to one transaction.

The case of Joseph vs. Joseph was placed at the foot of the docket when
